Mr. PHELAN. I have noticed this about the advocates of a guaranty bank system—I have an open mind on the thing and I want to get the argument, but I have noticed this—that they center the whole attention on the depositor, as if the depositor were the important person to be looked after in the banking system. Now it is a question whether that is the important thing.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am very glad the gentleman raised that point—

Mr. PHELAN. For example, although many people in Boston have been held up, on money deposited in banks—and they were all State banks, keep that in mind; they were all State banks that have failed, that have closed their doors—that may be simply an individual inconvenience or it may go a little farther, it may inconvenience a man's business; but if a bank is put in a position where it has to stop making loans or it is put in a position where it is obliged to contract credits, it can do ever so much more damage to the country, or to a particular community—ever so much more damage—than can be done to the depositors who cannot get their money. In other words, when we are looking at the banking system, we want to keep in mind that the bank not only serves the depositor—and, so far as we can do, properly and equitably, should be made to consider him fairly—but the bank must also be in a position where it can properly take care of borrowers.

Mr. SCOTT. Where does the bank get the money to loan to the borrowers?

Mr. McCLINTIC. That is what I was going to ask. The gentleman must take into consideration that the banking institution cannot operate unless it has the confidence of its depositors, and the bank must do business on the money furnished by the depositors.

Mr. SCOTT. It depends on the depositor for its working capital.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes; and the only privilege he gets is the checking system and to borrow money in case he can furnish sufficient collateral or is rated high enough to obtain the confidence of those in charge of the bank.

I am glad you raised that point, because I have introduced a bill here which is not perfect and will probably need amending, and it is my hope we can have a hearing to strengthen the various features that should be strengthened in a law of this kind; and on the point you have raised there, we ought to strengthen the regulations which have to do with the question of policies of our banks, which probably ought to receive some attention.

Mr. PHELAN. Just to take an example—I do not mean to imply there is any connection between the two things, and yet there may be some—you have a State guaranty system in Oklahoma.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes; and in Kansas and in Texas.

Mr. PHELAN. But in Oklahoma, I am talking about particularly. There was no State in the Union that was more severely criticized by the Comptroller of the Currency a few years ago than your State for what he deemed excessive interest rates charged by the banks down there.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes, sir.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not know there is any connection between the two things, perhaps not, but it is conceivable, possible, and even probable, that your borrowers down in Oklahoma can lose a great deal more by excessive interest rates than your depositors would suffer by failure of the banks to pay their obligations to the depositors in case of failure. That is my point.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I want to answer your point. Oklahoma, or a larger portion of it, was opened for settlement 18 years ago. It was possibly the newest country in the United States where there was a large rush of immigrants. When those people came into that country and settled in that country and in that community, those who engaged in the banking business knew very little about them, except that they came from some other section of the country. That being the case, the risk was greatly increased. I mean by that when a man was given a loan, they did not know anything about the moral part of the risk. And while he may have had a certain amount of collateral, the moral risk was not known; the banker did not know him in the same degree it could have known him in the older States. That being the case, the bankers felt it was necessary to increase the rates in order to take care of the percentage of losses because of that fact. As the time has rolled on and we have weeded out many of those who might be classed as undesirables, the interest rates have gone down until today they compare favorably with those in the older States.

Mr. PHELAN. Wasn't it decided to change them after the publicity given by the Comptroller?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I could not say as to that part.

Mr. STEVENSON. Those were national banks anyhow he was criticising, not banks under the guaranty system at all.

Mr. McCLINTIC. That is true; they were national banks. But that is the reason; it is because of the moral risk.

Mr. PHELAN. I said, in my question, there might be no connection between the two at all; but, of course, the State banks charge the same amount of interest.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Approximately.

Mr. PHELAN. My point was that you can do greater damage to a community in other ways than by losses to the depositors.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I cannot agree with you, because there is nothing on earth that will demoralize a community like a bank failure; and if you have lived in a small community where everything is taken care of by one bank and that bank has failed, you can appreciate this particular fact.

Mr. PHELAN. But do not beg the question. This bill provides a means to relieve depositors in failed banks, whereby they can be taken care of.

Mr. MCCLINTIC. That is true.

Mr. PHELAN. If you can prove the adoption of this system will result in fewer failed banks, you are making some progress, but you have not contemplated that and your bill does not propose to do it; so that when you say the failure of a bank in a community is disastrous, we all agree to that; but you are not taking care of that; you are taking care of the depositor after the failure. If your system will result in fewer failed banks, it is a very strong factor.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let me make this suggestion: My experience with a failed bank is that it ties up everything. Here is a bank with $500,000 of deposits in a community. They shut their doors. It is absolutely certain it will be 12 months and probably 15 before a dollar is paid out to the depositors. That $500,000 is taken right out of the commercial life of the community and tied up, and the result is the manufacturer over here who has a large deposit, and the merchant over there who has a large deposit and who expected to pay his bills with it, he has got his money tied up, and the next thing you know the merchant has gone to the wall. And then the depositor begins to get suspicious and he says "Here is my neighbor tied up down in this bank; I am going to take my money out of this other bank."

That is what broke 4 of the 5 trust companies in Boston, the loss of confidence that comes after a failure like that Napoleonic crash of Ponzis. And if you fix it so that whenever a bank closes its doors the commercial life goes on and the depositors can all have their money available and their business can go right along, then the other banks will have the money with which to finance the usual functions of banking in that community and it keeps business moving. And the whole thing turns on that proposition. That is my experience.

Mr. MCCLINTIC. Let me add this, and then I am through: In addition to what my friend, Mr. Stevenson, from South Carolina, has said, if this bill becomes a law, instead of tying up the capital of the bank that fails and causing runs on a great many other banking institutions, it will be possible simply to turn that bank over to or place it in the hands of some other person, or some other set of officers, and then the assets of the bank can be collected without having their value depreciated, and there will be no more excitement over that failed bank than there is over the change of the control in any other kind of a business institution. A little State bank went broke in my town, and I dare say there were not 25 people in the town who knew it. If we can protect our financial system without increasing the cost to any great extent by providing this kind of protection to those who furnish the working capital of a bank and, at the same time, strengthen the regulations relative to the officers and to the business plans of the bank, then it does seem to me that this committee would be willing to set a date ahead for a hearing and let everyone that wants to come before it and offer any kind of suggestions that they cared to, in order that a bill of this kind might be perfected. And that is the reason I have brought a bill here relating to this subject. I realize there are some amendments that ought to be offered. In fact, I have some here that I have thought of since introducing the bill that I wish to offer in case the bill is allowed to be perfected. My only interest in presenting this plan is that it will do something to create a more efficient plan of taking care of the business of the country and, at the same time, protect our people and all other kinds of industries and institutions in case there are bank failures in the future.

Mr. BROOKS. The best feature I see in this bill is that it may have the result of preventing runs on banks.

Mr. MCCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I am very grateful to you and the other members of this committee for the opportunity extended me to present my ideas in favor of this proposed legislation.

(Thereupon the committee adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, Jan. 21, at 10:30 o'clock a.m.)

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment which I offered by striking out the limitation of 5,000 population and inserting in lieu thereof 2,500.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I have just sent to the Speaker's desk an amendment of the same character as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN] which limits the provisions of section 309 to towns having a population of 3,000 or more. If the gentleman wishes to put it at 2,500, I would have withdrawn my amendment in favor of his; but on account of the objection made, I will not do that now.

I wish to say to the Membership of this House that it is not an evil to have officers or employees of banks in small towns perform this kind of insurance work. It has always been done. There are no adequate facilities in most cases in small villages of 1,000 or 1,200 or 1,500 population to do this kind of work. If this section is put into this bill, then the people who live in those smaller villages will have to go away to the larger cities in order to perform the business that they should do at home, and in order to have their insurances written. That in itself would be an evil. This work should not be prohibited here. This kind of legitimate work should be allowed to go on in small towns and villages. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN], and I hope the Membership of this House will not write into this bill, which we want to support, a provision which will drive away from it the good will of every man who lives in the smaller places. I venture the hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas, or else my amendment, may be incorporated in this section. I know what I am talking about. I live in a little village of only 1,200 people. In my county there is not a town exceeding 1,500 population. We look to the men in the banks to write our insurance. It is nothing that should be prohibited. In many cases it is the only way we can get our insurance taken care of.

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment, and that will give right of way to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I say again that I know how the business is being conducted in the small villages of this country. I hope you will vote for my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KVALE. Is not the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is pending. The Clerk is about to report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GILCHRIST: On page 75, line 20, add the following: "This section shall not apply to banks operating in towns of less than 3,000 inhabitants."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GILCHRIST) there were ayes 76 and noes 112.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SISSON: Page 75, line 9, strike out the letter "A" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "After 1 year from the date of the enactment of the Banking Act of 1933, no."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I submit the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SISSON].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SISSON: Page 75, line 15, after the word "selling", strike out the word "any"; and in line 16 strike out the words "form of"; and in line 16, after the word "insurance", change the period to a semicolon and add the following language: "but this section shall not apply when the insurance so written is insurance on the life of a borrower in connection with a loan and when the said life insurance is for the protection of a bank and/or the endorsers or comakers for said borrower."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I will take just a minute to explain the purpose of this. This applies to Morris Plan banks. I am going to assume that every Member of the House knows what a Morris Plan bank is, and knows that it is a means whereby the poor man or poor woman in a community may obtain a loan without paying an excessive rate of interest, without going to the note shaver, if you please. The limit of the loan is usually $200. The loan is supposed to be made upon the moral character of the borrower and the fact that he has two comakers on the note with him.

The Morris Plan bank when it makes this loan advises or requests him to take out an insurance policy in a company which is a company of their organization to the extent of the loan, namely, $100 or $200, for the protection of the bank and of the comakers. This provision in this law would prevent them from doing that.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I will say the committee has no objection to the amendment.

I now move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sisson].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that section 309 be stricken from the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MARTIN of Colorado: On page 75, beginning with line 9, strike out section 309.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 311. The foregoing provisions of this title shall take effect at such time as the President, by proclamation, declares that such surveys have been made as he finds necessary for the proper execution of such provisions, but in no event shall such provisions take effect later than 1 year after the enactment of this act.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BROWN of Kentucky: Page 76, line 3, after the word "effect", strike out the balance of the section and insert the following: "until the examinations provided in section 302-a of all State banks applying within 30 days from the enactment of this act have been completed and said applications approved or rejected."

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, this is the last opportunity the Members will have to express their views on this point. I want to make it clear to the Members that this is the last opportunity they will have to take care of their State banks.

When this bill becomes a law your national banks, your Reserve members, are immediately protected. The State banks have absolutely no protection until after they have been examined. This amendment provides that this act shall not take effect until after the examinations of the State banks have been completed.

A moment ago the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency objected to a certain amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan on the ground that if certain provisions of the bill were made effective immediately, there would be no opportunity of making these examinations.

I want to put an absolute safeguard in this bill so that the State banks will not be put under a handicap. In my town we have seven banks. Two of them are national banks. Put this law into effect and next Sunday's paper will carry the ad: "Our banks guaranteed by the Government. The other five are not."

What would you do if you had a deposit in the other banks? You would get your money and take it across the street to the bank that had the guaranty.

Now, this will work no hardship to the bill. The law will be just as effective.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's endeavor; but does not the gentleman think there should be a time limit within which the examinations of the State banks should be completed?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I take it those who administer this law will complete the examination just as quickly as they can, but I have written into this amendment that all

State banks which want protection must come in within 30 days. I take it those who are administering the law will complete the examinations just as speedily as possible.

Now, as I said, this is the last opportunity you are going to have to take care of your State banks. You cannot say that you left it to the President, because the President is not going to administer this act; and once it goes into effect with no provision whatever taking care of State banks, what are you going to say when you meet your State banker and he asks you: "What did you do to take care of the stockholders and depositors in our State banks?" Are you going to say you relied on the President? They sent you here to safeguard their interests. This is the last opportunity you will have to take care of the State banks. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BROWN of Kentucky) there were—ayes 116, noes 43.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WEIDEMAN: On page 76, in line 3, strike out the words "1 year" and insert in lieu thereof the words "6 months."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the House has already passed on this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may say to the gentleman from Michigan that the substance of his amendment has already been acted upon.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I am inclined to agree that it has. May I be heard on the point of order, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I wish the attention of the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency. He moved to close debate. He ought to hear this.

The section in the present bill makes the guarantee of bank deposits effective not later than 1 year after the passage of the bill. I believe that the people want their bank deposits guaranteed now and that the 1-year period should be changed to 6 months in order to make this bill operate sooner.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DOBBINS] has an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOBBINS: On page 76, after line 4, after the word "act", change the period to a colon and add the following: "Provided, That the provisions of this title, for the insurance of deposits in banks, shall become effective simultaneously in all banks then qualified therefor, but not until the Corporation shall have finally approved or rejected all applications from nonmember banks for participation in the plan of insurance, filed with the Corporation within 30 days after the enactment of this act, nor until final action shall have been taken upon all applications from nonmember banks for admission to the Federal Reserve System, regularly filed prior to the expiration of the said 30-day period."

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is covered very thoroughly by the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Brown], and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 312. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 21 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, there will be no objection if the gentleman will submit his amendment for a vote on the particular amendment and let that be the end of it. Is this satisfactory to the gentleman?

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman allow me 1 minute?

Mr. STEAGALL. Is this satisfactory to the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, for the life of me I cannot understand how any Member of this House can take upon himself the responsibility of objecting to a request which is the result of an agreement that has been entered into, after debate, and as a result of an understanding and agreement with members of the committee.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not confining his remarks to the subject of his motion.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman is quite correct, and if he wants to shut me off in that way he can do so.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would be willing for the gentleman to offer his amendment without debate. I would not have objected had the request been to return to this portion of the bill merely to offer the amendment.

Mr. KVALE. That is all I ask to do.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman asked for time.

Mr. KVALE. I said I would not insist on any time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman insisted on having a minute, and we cannot grant time to one without granting it to all.

Mr. STEAGALL. I suggest the Chair again submit the request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman merely wishes to offer an amendment I shall not object, but I shall object to any debate.

Mr. KVALE. I shall gladly accede to that.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the request is that we return merely for the purpose of offering the gentleman's amendment and if it is to be offered without debate, I shall not object.

Mr. KVALE. I so request, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I object unless the request is put in that form.

Mr. KVALE. I agree to that form.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KVALE: Page 28, line 25, after the words "not less than", strike out "$2,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$2,500, unless the capital of the bank shall not exceed $50,000, in which case he must own in his own right shares having a par value in the aggregate of not less than $1,500, unless the capital of the bank shall not exceed $25,000, in which case he must own in his own right shares having a par value in the aggregate of not less than $750."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KVALE) there were—ayes 136, noes 5.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 4, page 6, line 1, for the sole purpose of offering an amendment, without debate, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. DE PRIEST. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee automatically rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CANNON of Missouri, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5661) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of banks, to regulate inter-bank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes, under the provisions of the resolution he reported the same back to the House with the amendments adopted by the Committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I am.

The SPEAKER. Is any member of the committee opposed to the bill? If there is no member opposed to the bill who wishes to make a motion to recommit, the Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ZIONCHECK moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency with instructions to report the same back forthwith, amended as follows:

"On page 31, after line 4, insert a new section, as follows:

"Sec. 25. Paragraph 1 of section 16 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 248), is hereby amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That no such officer or employee shall receive a salary in excess of $10,000 per annum and in no case shall any such officer or employee receive a salary at a rate in excess of the rate of salary paid for like or similar positions which are subject to the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and to the Civil Service laws and regulations."

"And on page 57, line 2, before the period, insert the following:

"Provided, That no such officer or employee shall receive a salary in excess of $10,000 per annum, and in no case shall any such officer or employee receive a salary at a rate in excess of the rate of salary paid for like or similar positions which are subject to the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and to the Civil Service laws and regulations."

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that neither of the provisions of the motion to recommit are germane to any provision of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That has already been passed upon in Committee of the Whole and was held to be germane.

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having purchased United States Government securities with United States Government credit unlawfully taken and with having sold the said United States Government securities back to the people of the United States for gold or gold values and with having again purchased United States Government securities with United States Government credit unlawfully taken and with having again sold the said United States Government securities back to the people of the United States for gold or gold values, and I charge them with having defrauded the United States Government and the people of the United States by this rotary process; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having unlawfully negotiated United States Government securities, upon which the Government's liability was extinguished, as collateral security for Federal Reserve notes and with having substituted such securities for gold which was being held as collateral security for Federal Reserve notes, and with having by this process defrauded the United States Government and the people of the United States, and I charge them with the theft of all the gold and Federal Reserve currency they obtained by this process; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having unlawfully issued Federal Reserve currency on false, worthless, and fictitious acceptances and other circulating evidences of debt, and with having made unlawful advancements of Federal Reserve currency, and with having unlawfully permitted renewals of acceptances and renewals of other circulating evidences of debt, and with having permitted acceptance bankers and discount dealer corporations and other private bankers to violate the banking laws of the United States; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having conspired to have evidences of debt to the extent of over $1,000,000,000 artificially created at the end of February 1933 and early in March 1933, and with having made unlawful issues and advancements of Federal Reserve currency on the security of the said artificially created evidences of debt for a sinister purpose, and with having assisted in the execution of the said sinister purpose; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having brought about a repudiation of the currency obligations of the Federal Reserve banks to the people of the United States, and with having conspired to obtain a release for the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks from their contractual liability to redeem all Federal Reserve currency in gold or lawful money at any Federal Reserve bank, and with having defrauded the holders of Federal Reserve currency, and with having conspired to have the debts and losses of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks unlawfully transferred to the Government and the people of the United States; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having unlawfully substituted Federal Reserve currency and other irredeemable paper currency for gold in the hands of the people after the decision to repudiate the Federal Reserve currency and the national currency was made known to them, and with having thus obtained money under false pretenses; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having brought about a repudiation of the national currency of the United States in order that the gold value of the said currency might be given to private interests, foreign governments, foreign central banks of issue, and the Bank for International Settlements, and the people of the United States be left without gold or lawful money and with no currency other than a paper currency irredeemable in gold, and I charge them with having done this for the benefit of private interests, foreign governments, foreign central banks of issue, and the Bank for International Settlements; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with conniving with the Edge law banks and other Edge law institutions, accepting banks, and discount corporations, unlawfully to finance foreign governments, foreign central banks of issue, foreign commercial banks, foreign corporations, and foreign individuals with funds unlawfully taken from the United States Treasury; and I charge them with having unlawfully permitted and made possible "mass financing" of foreigners at the expense of the United States Treasury to the extent of billions of dollars and with having unlawfully permitted and made possible the bringing into the United States of immense quantities of foreign securities, created in foreign countries for export to the United States, and with having unlawfully permitted the said foreign securities to be imported into the United States instead of gold, which was lawfully due to the United States on trade balances and otherwise, and with having unlawfully permitted and facilitated the sale of the said foreign securities in the United States in a manner prejudicial to the public welfare and inimical to the Government of the United States; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having unlawfully made loans of gold and of gold values belonging to the bank depositors and the general public of the United States to foreign governments, foreign central banks of issue, foreign commercial banks, foreign corporations, and individuals, and the Bank for International Settlements, to the loss and detriment of the Government and the people of the United States; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having unlawfully exported gold reserves belonging to the national bank depositors and gold belonging to the general public of the United States to foreign countries, and with having converted the said gold into foreign currencies, and with having used it for the benefit of foreigners, and for speculative purposes abroad, and with having unlawfully converted to their own use and the use of others gold belonging to the United States stored or held in foreign countries, and with having unlawfully prevented the shipment to the United States of the said gold which was due to the United States, and with having permitted the importation under their supervision of false, worthless, and fictitious trade paper and foreign securities of doubtful value in lieu of it, and with having caused the United States to lose the said gold; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having unlawfully exported United States coins and currency for a sinister purpose, and with having deprived the people of the United States of their lawful circulating medium of exchange, and I charge them with having arbitrarily and unlawfully reduced the amount of money and currency in circulation in the United States to the lowest rate per capita in the history of the Government, so that the great mass of the people have been left without a sufficient medium of exchange, and I charge them with concealment and evasion in refusing to make known the amount of United States money in coins and paper currency exported abroad and the amount remaining in the United States, as a result of which refusal the Congress of the United States is unable to ascertain where the United States coins and issues of currency are at the present time and what amount of United States currency is now held abroad; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having arbitrarily and unlawfully raised and lowered the rates on money and with having arbitrarily increased and diminished the volume of currency in circulation for the benefit of private interests and foreign speculators at the expense of the Government and the people of the United States and with having unlawfully manipulated money rates, wages, salaries, and property values, both real and personal, in the United States, by unlawful operations in the open discount market and by resale and repurchase agreements unsanctioned by law; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having brought about the decline in prices on the New York Stock Exchange and other exchanges in October 1929 by unlawful manipulation of money rates and volume of United States money and currency in circulation; by thefts of funds from the United States Treasury; by gambling in acceptances and United States Government securities; by services rendered to foreign and domestic speculators and politicians, and by the unlawful sale of United States gold reserves, and whereas I charge that the unconstitutional inflation law imbedded in the so-called "Farm Relief Act" by which the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks are given permission to buy United States Government securities to the extent of $3,000,000,000 and to draw forth currency from the people's Treasury to the extent of $3,000,000,000 is likely to result by connivance on the part of the said accused with others in the purchase by the Federal Reserve banks of United States Government securities to the extent of $3,000,000,000 with the United States Government's own credit unlawfully taken, it being obvious that the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks do not intend to pay anything of value to the United States Government for the said United States Government securities—no provision for payment in gold or lawful money appearing in the so-called "Farm Relief Act"—and that the United States Government will thus be placed in the position of conferring a gift of $3,000,000,000 in United States Government securities on the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks to enable them to pay more of their bad debts to foreign governments, foreign central banks of issue, private interests, and private and commercial banks, both foreign and domestic, and the Bank for International Settlements, and whereas the United States Government will thus go into debt to the extent of $3,000,000,000 and will then have an additional claim for $3,000,000,000 in currency unlawfully created against it and whereas no private interests should be permitted to buy United States Government securities with the Government's own credit unlawfully taken and whereas currency should not be issued for the benefit of the said private interests or any interests on United States Government securities so acquired, and whereas it has been publicly stated and not denied that the inflation amendment to the Farm Relief Act is the matter of benefit which was secured by Ramsay MacDonald, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, upon the occasion of his latest visit to the White House and the United States Treasury, and whereas there is grave danger that the accused will employ the provision creating United States Government securities to the extent of $3,000,000,000 and $3,000,000,000 in currency to be issuable thereupon for the benefit of themselves and their foreign principals, and that they will convert the currency so obtained to the uses of Great Britain by secret arrangements with the Bank of England of which they are the agents, and for which they maintain an account and perform services at the expense of the United States Treasury, and that they will likewise confer benefits upon the Bank for International Settlements for which they maintain an account and perform services at the expense of the United States Treasury; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having unlawfully concealed the insolvency of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks and with having failed to report the insolvency of the Federal Reserve banks to the Congress and with having conspired to have the said insolvent institutions continue in operation, and with having permitted the said insolvent institutions to receive United States Government funds and other deposits, and with having permitted them to exercise control over the gold reserves of the United States and with having permitted them to transfer upward of $100,000,000,000 of their debts and losses to the general public and the Government of the United States, and with having permitted foreign debts of the Federal Reserve banks to be paid with the property, the savings, the wages, and the salaries of the people of the United States, and with the farms and homes of the American people, and whereas I charge them with forcing the bad debts of the Federal Reserve banks upon the general public covertly and dishonestly and with taking the general wealth and savings of the people of the United States under false pretenses, to pay the debts of the Federal Reserve banks to foreigners, and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with violations of the Federal Reserve Act and other laws; with maladministration of the Federal Reserve Act; and with evasions of Federal Reserve law and other laws, and with having unlawfully failed to report violations of law on the part of Federal Reserve banks which, if known, would have caused the said Federal Reserve banks to lose their charters, and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with failure to protect and maintain the gold reserves and the gold stock and gold coinage of the United States and with having sold the gold reserves of the United States to foreign governments, foreign central banks of issue, foreign commercial and private banks, and other foreign institutions and individuals at a profit to themselves, and I charge them with having sold gold reserves of the United States so that between 1924 and 1928 the United States gained no gold on net account, but suffered a decline in its percentage of central gold reserves from 45.9 percent in 1924 to 37.5 percent in 1928 notwithstanding the fact that the United States had a favorable balance of trade throughout that period; and

Whereas the United States was the only country which lost a considerable quantity of gold during that period, to wit, 1924 to 1928, inclusive, I charge them with the theft and sale of the said gold to their foreign principals, and I charge them with the theft and sale of 10 percent of the entire gold stock of the United States during the last 4 months of 1927 and during 1928 after crediting all importations of gold received by the United States during that period, this theft and sale of 10 percent of the gold stock of the United States occasioning the largest gold outflow from the United States that had ever theretofore occurred, and I charge them with the theft and sale of all the gold reserves exported from the United States from the year 1928 to the present time, a period during which the United States has lost gold continuously and has gained no gold on net account, notwithstanding the fact that the balance of trade and accounts throughout the entire period has been in favor of the United States; and

Whereas the United States has received no gold on net account since 1923, a period of 10 years during which the United States has had a favorable balance of trade and has had large sums due to it and payable in gold from foreign nations and has not received such sums in gold, I charge them, the said accused, with the theft of gold which was lawfully due to the United States, with the theft of gold belonging to the United States, and with the unlawful diversion of United States gold to the treasuries and central banks of foreign countries, and I charge them with concealment of the true condition and amount of the gold reserves of the United States at the present time; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having conspired to concentrate United States Government securities and thus the national debt of the United States in the hands of foreigners and international money lenders and with having conspired to transfer to foreigners and international money lenders title to and control of the financial resources of the United States; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having fictitiously paid installments on the national debt with Government credit unlawfully taken; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with the loss of United States Government funds intrusted to their care; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having destroyed independent banks in the United States and with having thereby caused losses amounting to billions of dollars to the depositors of the said banks and to the general public of the United States; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with failure to furnish true reports of the business operations and the condition of the Federal Reserve banks to the Congress and the people, and with having furnished false and misleading reports to the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having published false and misleading propaganda intended to deceive the American people and to cause the United States to lose its independence; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with unlawfully allowing Great Britain to share in the profits of the Federal Reserve System at the expense of the Government and the people of the United States; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having entered into secret agreements and illegal transactions with Montagu Norman, governor of the Bank of England; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with swindling the United States Treasury and the people of the United States in pretending to have received payment from Great Britain of the amount due on the British war debt to the United States in December 1932; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having conspired with their foreign principals and others to defraud the United States Government and to prevent the people of the United States from receiving payment of the war debts due to the United States from foreign nations; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having robbed the United States Government and the people of the United States by their theft and sale of the gold reserve of the United States and other unlawful transactions, and with having created a deficit in the United States Treasury which has necessitated to a large extent the destruction of our national defense and the reduction of the United States Army and the United States Navy and other branches of the national defense; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with having reduced the United States from a first-class power to one that is dependent, and with having reduced the United States from a rich and powerful Nation to one that is internationally poor; and

Whereas I charge them, jointly and severally, with the crime of having treasonably conspired and acted against the peace and security of the United States, and with having treasonably conspired to destroy constitutional government in the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to investigate the official conduct of Eugene Meyer, Roy A. Young, Edmund Platt, Eugene R. Black, Adolph Caspar Miller, Charles S. Hamlin, George R. James, Andrew W. Mellon, Ogden L. Mills, William H. Woodin, John W. Pole, J. F. T. O'Connor, members of the Federal Reserve Board; and F. H. Curtiss, J. H. Case, R. L. Austin, George De Camp, L. B. Williams, W. W. Hoxton, Oscar Newton, E. M. Stevens, J. S. Wood, J. N. Payton, M. L. McClure, C. C. Walsh, Isaac B. Newton, Federal Reserve agents, to determine whether, in the opinion of the said committee, they have been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor which, in the contemplation of the Constitution, requires the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House. Such committee shall report its findings to the House, together with such resolution or resolutions of impeachment or other recommendations as it deems proper.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures as it deems necessary.

During the reading of the above the following occurred:

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I wish to submit the question to the Speaker as to whether or not a person who is not now in office is subject to impeachment? This resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers to several people who are no longer holding any public office. They are not now at least civil officers. The Constitution provides that the "President, Vice President, and all civil officers shall be removed from office on impeachment", and so forth. I have had no opportunity to examine the precedents since this matter came up, but it occurs to me that the resolution takes in too much territory to make it privileged.

The SPEAKER. That is a constitutional question which the Chair cannot pass upon, but should be passed upon by the House.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution and charge be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF BANKS

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill (H.R. 5661).

The motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PATMAN) there were—ayes 262, noes 19.

So the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GUARANTY OF BANK DEPOSITS

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, coming from a section of the land where bank failures and the closing of banks, State and national, have caused untold distress and hardship, I arise to speak in favor of the pending bill, H.R. 5661, with more than ordinary interest.

Living in a township in which 80,000 people reside, where every one of its seven banks closed its doors, and this within the metropolitan area of Detroit, I yield to no person the right to claim greater knowledge of the misery and deprivation to which such a situation can subject a people.

Only once before in the history of the Nation, namely in 1837, did a like situation occur in this country when all the banks of the land practically closed at one time. That was known as the "wildcat period" of our national existence. Then every bank issued its own money. The country had launched itself upon a program of expansion and the construction of internal improvements, such as canals and railroads. It was a boom time, a period of great inflation, and in its train came conditions not unlike the present.

The present economic period, caused by inflation, abnormal prices, and, also, by abnormal growth in the large populated centers of the country, has again left our people in the slough of despair and misery. Their life's earnings and savings have been swept away and have vanished like mist before the rising sun. Thousands of banks in the country have closed, not because all bankers have been dishonest or have overreached, but because of the unparalleled depreciation of the securities in which the banks have invested their money. But regardless of how or what the cause has been that has closed the banks, the result is exactly the same, viz, that the people of the country have lost all faith and confidence in our banks and in our banking system and institutions.

In addition to the enormous sums of money lost, there has also been an enormous sum of money which has gone into hiding, and I am informed that the amount is nearly $2,000,000,000, which has been withdrawn from the channels of trade and of commerce. It has been secreted in the button box, the family clock, the secret drawer, and the safety-deposit box. That money is going to remain there until this Congress passes some form of legislation to guarantee or insure to the people the safety of their hard-earned money.

The bill before the House may not be a perfect bill in its entirety, but it does contain the principle which the country is demanding, namely, that the deposits from now on in banks, whether national or State, shall be guaranteed and secured to the people. That principle has my complete and hearty endorsement. The temper and feeling of the people, in which their loss of confidence is reflected, is borne out by the fact that the Postal Savings deposits in the United States have increased more than 100 percent in the last 12 months, and today I have been informed by the Post Office Department that the amount of money now on deposit in the Postal Savings Department of the Government amounts to $1,157,651,000, bearing interest at 2 percent. There is only one answer to this tremendous increase in the deposits of the Postal Savings Department and that is that the people still have faith and confidence in the Government of the United States. It is one bank in the country that has never closed, and the depositors know they can have their money upon demand.

Let us support this bill and guarantee to all the people the same security of their deposits in banks that the people now have in the Postal Savings of the Nation. It will do much to restore the faith and confidence of the people, not only in the financial institutions and the banking system of the country but it will restore faith and hope in the people.

Idle dollars make idle men. Encourage hidden wealth to march out of its hiding places into the proper channels of commerce and industry and the wheels of business will begin to turn again. Money will be more plentiful; credit will be reestablished; funds will be available for legitimate enterprises, and upon the whole the country will be greatly benefited, and we will do much toward restoring prosperity to our people by this constructive piece of legislation. I hope the bill will pass and be enacted into law at the earliest possible date.

REORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENT BUREAUS

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, there has been so much discussion of the possibility of transferring work now done by the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to other bureaus or departments that I believe it is the logical time to point out some of the reasons why such a transfer should not be put into effect. For perhaps 20 years there has been agitation for the consolidation of public-works activities of the Government and there is always coupled with this the suggestion that the civil duties of the Engineer Corps be taken over by some other bureau or a department of public works. This proposal was renewed in the presidential message of December 9, 1932, recommending consolidation of various governmental agencies. Broad authority has been given to the President with a view to reorganization of the Federal Government.

My purpose is to present some of the facts and considerations which should be cited in opposition to this transfer. First, however, it is useful to examine the reasons advanced by groups of civilian engineers and others who have appeared at congressional hearings in favor of this transfer. These arguments are without exception speculative generalities without statistical foundation. They fall into four general groups; namely, that (1) such a transfer would result in economy; (2) that it would bring greater efficiency; (3) that it is unfair to civilian engineers to have the work performed by the military branch of the Government; and (4) that the Engineer Corps would be benefited by the proposed transfer and national defense better served.

A. It is asserted that such a transfer would produce substantial economies in public-works expenditures, probably from 15 to 25 percent—no particulars given. The statements generally made in support of this assertion are:

First. By consolidating all public works many overlapping functions would be eliminated; reductions in personnel and operating expenses would be achieved.

The principal civil duties of the Corps of Engineers are flood control, rivers and harbors works and allied services, and certain construction and maintenance duties in the District of Columbia and in connection with memorials. All these are specialized functions which in no sense overlap with the functions of any other branch of the Government. In instances where the facilities of other departments are of incidental use to the corps, or where it is able to render assistance to other branches, the fullest cooperation is practiced.

Second. The Engineer Corps has equipment valued at approximately $60,000,000, but only uses it in conducting less than $20,000,000 of work each year. This would represent a ruinous waste in the case of private engineering firms. Under the proposed consolidation this expensive equipment would be available for all Government works and would be of more constant public value.

These statements are inaccurate. The work done with Government plant and hired help each year is not 30 percent the value of the plant but approximately 100 percent. A large part of this plant consists of sea-going dredges with a useful life of 25 years. Much of this plant is kept at points where may arise emergencies involving great losses to commerce, and it may, therefore, be considered to serve the same purpose as a fire department, not an idle plant. Finally, this equipment enables the Engineer Corps to keep at a minimum bids for work submitted by private contractors, as it operates with hired labor all works for which the lowest bids are in excess of 25 percent more than the Army estimates of costs. Over a 5-year period the savings on work executed on which bids had been rejected amounted to 38 percent. In determining these costs the Corps of Engineers includes depreciation and carrying charges on its plant, so that comparisons with private bids are equitable.

Third. More than $2,000,000,000 have been spent through the Engineer Corps for construction and maintenance, not including the original cost of the Panama Canal. It is contended that the great works for which the Engineer Corps receives credit were actually done by civilian engineers, and that there is no evidence that these works were done with greater economy than they would have been if entirely under the direction of civilian engineers.

The burden of proof in this respect does not rest with the Corps of Engineers, as probably no other group of works of such magnitude may be cited in whose history there has never been a suspicion of graft, waste, and incompetence. In more than a century there has been but one case of an officer who has been accused of irregularity.

Fourth. The assertion is frequently made that the United States stands almost alone among civilized nations in not having all of its public works under a consolidated department of public works. This is cited as evidence of the superior economy of consolidation.

This statement is misleading; as a matter of fact, in Canada the rivers and harbors work is conducted by three different agencies; in Great Britain it is spread among many governmental and private agencies; in Germany and many other countries it is conducted by various state agencies; and in France the system practically parallels ours.

The foregoing are the chief contentions that economies would be realized by the proposed consolidation of rivers and harbors work under a public-works agency.

B. Advocates of the transfer of these functions assert that superior efficiency will be realized. The following reasons are advanced:

First. Probably, it is said, only about one third of the personnel of the Corps of Engineers could qualify as engineers in the professional meaning of the word. The training at West Point is said not to be the equivalent of a technical school. Consequently civilian engineers of established ability are frequently under the authority of untrained Army officers.

The training required in the Corps of Engineers exceeds that of civilian engineers. Four years at West Point, which is recognized as the equivalent of a bachelor of science in engineering; 2 years as student officer attached to rivers and harbors work, learning every practical detail from the ground up; a post-graduate course of a year at a leading technical institution; a special rivers and harbors course at the engineering school at Fort Humphreys; detail as assistant to district engineers. The Corps of Engineers in its conduct of the civil-construction operations has become a national institution with a most enviable heritage to maintain. Officers of the corps are permitted to assume responsible authority over public works only after a most thorough training acquired by technical and practical application under the tutelage of officers of ripe experience. Only after considerable service in this capacity may an officer be put in authority over any of the works. The fact that Army engineers are frequently offered high salaries in civilian engineering is ample evidence that they are equipped to compete with civilians in a professional capacity.

Second. The frequent transfers of officers detailed to public works from one post to another at intervals of 3 or 4 years is considered as a grave handicap, preventing continuity of policy and dividing the responsibility for the work.

Granting that an officer may need a little time to orient himself to the problems of a new post, these changes are considered highly desirable from a civil as well as a military viewpoint. They tend to stabilize standards of Army work at a high and uniform level. Change of station is also very important in that it stimulates and infuses the spirit of the local organization forces, reducing human tendency to become routine, prosaic, and self-satisfied. Change of officers not only permits a broadening of the officer's vision, but also effectively insures against a common tendency of the local force to take things for granted to the expense and disadvantage of the Government. This matter of regulated change in station is one of the very most important matters in the successful and economical conduct of Federal work and of officer personnel. Instead of preventing continuity of policy, the changes most decidedly preserve continuity of a national policy, forestalling the building-up of local detached practices in the conduct of public work which would soon become, if not controlled, both costly and detrimental to the best interests of the United States. An officer at a new post finds there an established routine which is identical with the post he has left, and he takes up his duties with the valuable knowledge of river and harbor work from a national viewpoint, free from local influence and prejudices. Thus ruts are avoided and wider experience is applied to each job.

Third. Promotions and assignments of Army engineers depend on Army politics and not upon engineering ability.

This statement was evidently published in ignorance of the fact that promotions are automatic in the Engineer Corps. Probably in no other organization, public or private, is advancement as free from politics. As for the assignments, the posts are filled by the men whose records show them to be the best fitted for them.

Fourth. No one in the War Department cares very much whether one of these civil works costs a million dollars or so more or less than it should. * * * No one seems to care as long as the papers are straight.

This opinion does not take into account the fact that the Engineer Corps has a magnificent tradition of public service, and that there is a healthy element of competition with other Government departments in seeking to produce the best possible results for the money expended. Moreover, in no other branch of the Government does each project come under the scrutiny of as many disinterested officials before it is approved.

Fifth. Excessive red tape and paper work cause unnecessary delays.

No Government department, particularly the one to which the proposed transfer is to be made, is as free of red tape as a private corporation, for the obvious reason of its accountability for funds. This is the procedure for any rivers and harbors works: Upon request from Congress, a preliminary examination by the district engineer is undertaken to ascertain the probable public usefulness of his project. His report goes in turn for approval to the division engineer, the Board of Engineers, the Chief of Engineers, and the Secretary of War. If recommendations are favorable, an estimate of costs is authorized, and this follows the same route and is finally transmitted to Congress for authorization, and, if granted, an appropriation when the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers indicates the project can be advantageously carried forward. This procedure is further refutation of argument "4."

Sixth. There is insufficient inspection work to keep headquarters in Washington in touch with the progress of each project.

This decentralization of the Engineer Corps activities by which each district engineer and division engineer is responsible for the works under his supervision tends to promote efficiency and keep departmental overhead at a minimum. Each is thoroughly familiar with the problems in his locality and is relieved of the interference of a large central organization which would require a large office staff.

C. Civilian engineers assert that it is unfair to the profession to have the rivers and harbors work under the exclusive direction of military officers.

First. About 70 or 80 percent of the work administered by the Corps of Engineers, it is inaccurately stated, is actually let out to private contractors. And the work that is conducted by the Engineer Corps is largely done by the 1,000 civilian engineers it employs. Only about 150 officers are assigned to the service in supervisory capacity. Thus, while these receive all the credit they can only do at most 5 percent of the work.

Second. It is unjust to exclude the 200,000 civilian engineers of the country from the opportunity to participate in the important rivers and harbors works.

Third. The monopoly of this work by the Engineers Corps is a reflection upon the engineering schools and upon the other engineering branches of the Government. By maintaining that only the Army can do this to best public advantage, the implication is that West Point graduates are superior to all others.

These arguments are obviously of little importance. It is true that the Army officers assigned to the work are negligible in relative numbers, and that the bulk of the actual work is done by civilian engineers. But if these officers, drawing the very modest Army salaries, were to be withdrawn from these services, few engineers competent to undertake the responsibilities for supervising the expenditure of more than a hundred million dollars annually could be found who would do the work and remain in the service at salaries less than several times as high. Many officers receiving $5,000 to $6,000 a year have responsibilities commensurate with those of engineers receiving, in civil life, $50,000.

It is frequently said that the rivers and harbors work is an expensive training school for military engineers. But it would be infinitely more expensive as a sort of philanthropic institution for the benefit of the engineering profession, which has succeeded, without this help, in growing to 200,000 members. As a matter of fact, many Civil Service engineers receive training as employees of the Engineer Corps which enables them to earn salaries many times higher than those of the officers.

D. It is asserted that the Engineer Corps would benefit by the proposed transfer and that national defense would be better served.

First. Flood control and rivers and harbors work are no more a primary function of the Army than are postal and telegraph services. Therefore it would be of advantage to release the Engineer Corps from these civil duties for purely military activities.

In peace time there is little strictly military engineering work to be done which is comparable to the activities the Corps of Engineers is called upon to conduct in time of war. These civil duties are therefore invaluable training and are essential to national defense. They also enable an indispensable group of officers which would have to be maintained to render a great public service at low cost to the public.

Second. The civil-engineering works of the Corps of Engineers is regarded by most of the Army as time and energy wasted, and experience and skill in this work, instead of helping in the advancement of an officer, become a bar to his promotion.

This will be seen to be unfounded when we consider that the Engineer Corps has the pick of the graduates of West Point, and that the average age of its officers has generally been lower than that of other services, indicating more rapid advancement.

Third. With all public works consolidated under one Government agency, officers of the Corps of Engineers could put their knowledge to good use by being detailed for work under this department, and they could broaden their experience by being assigned to other types of engineering.

Such a procedure would break the morale of the Engineer Corps and destroy a magnificent tradition. Further, it is inconsistent with the argument that the rivers and harbors work is an expensive training school for the Army. Here it is proposed to replace low-salaried officers with high-salaried civilians, and then to assign officers to work in which they have not had specialized experience and in which they would be at their minimum value to the public. A better proposal would be to consolidate some of the other Government engineering activities under the Corps of Engineers, whose record for efficiency is unexcelled by any institution, public or private.

Fourth. In time of war the Army is obliged to employ a great number of civilian engineers. Therefore the more opportunity there is for them to be trained, the more will be available in time of emergency.

The obvious fallacy of this point is that if civilians were to replace the officers, man for man, there would only be 150 additional trained. And there would be left no body of engineering officers experienced in supervising civilian engineers and fitted to cooperate with them in war-time activity.

These various assertions constitute practically the entire case for the transfer, as it has been presented by various persons and agencies at various times for more than 20 years. Persons alleged to be spokesmen for a group of civilian engineers have asserted that savings of 15 to 25 percent could be effected by the consolidation, but have failed when requested to cite a single concrete instance in which this could be done.

The remainder of this report will present a few definite facts to indicate the economy and high order of efficiency of the operations of the Corps of Engineers.

STATISTICS ON OVERHEAD COSTS OF RIVER AND HARBOR WORK

The following tabulation is based on the 5-year period of 1928-32. The sums are totals and the percentages are average annual overhead.

	Field costs of work done	Overhead costs			Overhead percentage
		Distribution and division	Departmental	Totals
Hired labor.....	$229,632,058.97	$16,696,041.94			Percent
Contract work.....	231,892,708.85	8,691,744.80			7.27
	461,524,767.02	25,387,786.74			5.50
Total.....			$970,602		0.19
				$26,358,388.74	5.69
Work plus overhead.....	487,883,156.86				5.40

The items included in overhead in this tabulation are: Personal services, clerical, professional, inspection, pay of officers; rents, telephone and telegraph, travel, motor-vehicle operation, speedboat operation, operation of other inspection boats, and miscellaneous, including forms, stationery, freight and cartage, depreciation of furniture and fixtures, laundry, ice, and miscellaneous office supplies.

This tabulation shows that the departmental overhead for these works averages only 0.19 percent; the field overhead, 5.5 percent; the total overhead, 5.69 percent; and the total overhead on the total expenditures, 5.4 percent.

The salaries paid to officers assigned to rivers and harbors works, at the rate of about $205,000 a year, amount to about 0.18 percent of the total expenditures.

To state these figures in another way, for every $1,000 worth of rivers and harbors work, $54 is spent on field and office overhead, of which $1.90 sustains the office of the Chief of Engineers, and $1.80 is paid to officers assigned to these duties.

These figures may well be considered an irreducible minimum for an organization covering about 50 districts spread throughout the country.

The Engineer Corps estimates, from its commerce statistics, that the rivers and harbors works save the Nation an amount approaching $500,000,000 a year in transportation costs. This constitutes approximately a return of 500 percent on the annual expenditure of about $100,000,000 for this work.

Value and use of plant

	Book value	Cost of work done with it, 1932
Rivers and harbors:
Floating and land plant.....	$35,215,466.32	$36,595,065.91
Shops, yards, including buildings.....	2,637,656.08
Total.....	37,853,111.40
Others, floating and land plant.....	11,647,001.23	12,071,867.41
	2,172,172.36
Total plant.....	51,672,284.99	48,666,933.32
(This does not include District of Columbia water works, $6,456,289.50.)

This equipment is almost entirely of long-lived type, as contrasted with the short-lived plants generally used for ordinary construction. The sea-going hopper dredges, for example, valued at $8,582,725.37, have an estimated useful life of 25 years. In 1932 dredging with these was conducted at the low average cost of 7.67 cents a cubic yard.

Thus, contrary to assertions cited, it will be seen that the equipment of the Corps of Engineers is used to unusually good advantage.

CIVIL DUTIES AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

No proposal for the transfer of the civil duties of the Corps of Engineers should be discussed without taking into consideration its influence upon national defense. In times of peace the military activities of the Engineer Corps are negligible as compared with war times. During the World War the corps handled 500 to 700 times as much military engineering as in time of peace.

These war-time activities, however, were only about 10 times the volume of the civil engineering currently supervised by the Engineer Corps, or about $1,162,000,000. That the Engineers Corps is elastic and capable of rapid expansion or contraction of activity is shown by its peace-time record. With rivers and harbors appropriations varying, from year to year, as much as 50 percent it has succeeded in adapting itself to these changes without much change in overhead expense and without disruption of its organization. In war time, as has been shown, it was capable of effecting a much greater expansion with efficiency.

It is obvious, however, that the military-engineering duties in peace time are insufficient to maintain a functioning organization which would be prepared to increase its activity, in an emergency, several hundredfold without enormous losses and inefficiencies. Even under the proposed transfer should Army officers be detailed for work in other departments, the supervisory organization of the corps would be largely wiped out. The officers might derive engineering experience, but they would lose the large value of conducting a great engineering activity upon a national scale.

Despite its enormous civil activities, the Engineer Corps is at present under its quota strength. There is therefore no question of reducing it by taking away these civil duties. On the contrary, if consolidations are to be made, it would be preferable to place other engineering services, such as road and bridge construction, under the supervision of the Army engineers and thus to profit by their unexcelled economy and efficiency while further contributing to the training of an absolutely vital branch of the Army.

In considering the entire problem, there are these three distinct points which seem to stand out most prominently:

First. The lack of morale which is bound to occur in case Army engineers, holding commissions in the United States Army and taking their orders primarily from the Chief of Engineers, are assigned to other departments of the Government.

The result would mean that engineers detailed to duty other than under their own chief would be serving two masters, so to speak, which would not only be disastrous for the esprit de corps of the Engineer officers, but further would be bound to break down the authority of the Chief of Engineers over his subordinates.

Second. The lack of outside influence which is so pronounced in work, which the Corps of Engineers is carrying on, particularly in rivers and harbors work, would give away to these influences in the event such work were detailed to a department under the supervision of one from civil life and holding an appointive office whose appointment might involve partisanship.

The record of the engineers in this respect is magnificent, and today that body has the confidence of the people throughout the country in their complete honesty and intent of purpose, irrespective of political influence. This is true not only after the various projects are authorized to be carried on by the engineers but in their consideration as to the desirability and feasibility of projects where their favorable recommendation is necessary.

Third. In the matter of economy, it would appear that a transfer of the duties of the Corps of Engineers to some other department and the severing of the Engineer Corps from any activity in civil duties which are now imposed upon them, would be an added expense to the Government due to the fact that the Engineer Corps must continue in its position as an integral part of the Army, and additional personnel would be required to carry on the work which the engineers do in peace times in case these duties were taken from them.

CHILD LABOR AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the secretary of state of the State of New Hampshire, announcing that the legislature of that State had ratified the proposed amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the labor of persons under 18 years of age.

J. PIERPONT MORGAN

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this body has been considering a banking bill of far-reaching importance for the past several days, a bill to guarantee bank deposits, it occurs to me that it would not be altogether out of order but entirely fitting to call attention of the House at this time to the fact that the world's richest banker has "honored" this Capital City with his august presence. He condescended to come to Washington last evening, so I am advised, at the urgent invitation of a congressional committee before which he testified somewhat reluctantly today.

As J. Pierpont Morgan sallied forth from his palatial hotel in this city, where he is said to be occupying one entire floor, he was flanked by private guards on every side bearing artillery and sidearms that resembled a whole regiment ready for combat. This world-renowned banker strode forth like a real general armed to the belt and prepared to do battle.

When the "general" and his army arrived at the Capitol a mad rush was made, not only by newspaper reporters, movietone representatives and photographers, but by Members of Congress in a frantic effort to catch a glimpse of the world's richest and most powerful banker.

Mr. Morgan proceeded to give the Senate Banking and Currency Committee a very carefully prepared lecture on private banking and he evidently did not want to be disturbed by being asked annoying and, of course, insignificant questions. But the youthful Senate counsel was unkind enough to insist on asking the great head of the House of Morgan some rather personal questions. One of the first asked Mr. Morgan by this inquisitive and rather persistent young attorney was, "How much income tax did you personally pay during the years of 1930, 1931, and 1932?" To the astonishment of the committee and the public this great financier reluctantly but gravely admitted that he paid no income taxes to his Government for the past 3 years.

This ultrarich man is able to employ high-powered legal and financial experts and by some hook or crook, mostly "crook", I judge, this great world-famed international banker, whose firm lends money by the hundreds of millions of dollars, has escaped all his income taxes during the past 3 dark years while Congress has been making a desperate effort to balance the Budget and place this Government on an even keel. Remember, too, that while this and other sessions of Congress have been heaping additional tax burdens upon the farmer, the laborer, and small business man, this man Morgan has made no contribution to maintain the Government that has been so good and generous to him.

The revelation the world has received today of income-tax evasion by this outstanding international banker is not only a result of the work of high-powered, trained financial experts, who are paid for the purpose of outfiguring officials of the Government but it is also the result of permitting the rendering of secret income-tax returns. That practice ought to be stopped by this Congress and stopped now. [Applause.]

Is there any wonder, Mr. Speaker that there are discontent and riots among our people, many of whom have been driven from their homes because they were unable to pay their taxes or the interest on their loans, when they learn that the richest and most powerful banker in all the world admits under oath that he has somehow managed to escape all his income taxes during the years of 1930, 1931, and 1932?

Al Capone is serving a sentence in the penitentiary for income-tax evasion. Should I desire to be harsh or unkind, I might suggest that a financial racketeer from Wall Street is no less reprehensible than a gangster from Chicago. I will not say that, although the suggestion might be food for thought. I do submit, however, if the House of Morgan and other Wall Street manipulators and tax evaders paid their just share of the burdens of government that we would now have a surplus in the Treasury instead of a deficit, big business as well as little business would have more respect for this Congress and Government of the whole, and we would not now be faced with the serious and perplexing problems of raising additional revenues to finance the increasing activities of the Federal Government. [Applause.]

PUBLIC WORKS BILL

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, the public works bill, and a copy of the report, will be available to Members of the House in the document room in the morning. I ask unanimous consent that the committee have until midnight tonight to file its report.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is there to be any minority report; and if so, will the gentleman incorporate that with the main report?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I shall if there is any, but I understand there is not to be any.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, when will this bill be taken up?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Not until the day after tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, on May 2 of this session the Honorable JED JOHNSON, of Oklahoma, introduced into the House Concurrent Resolution 17, giving preference to veterans who are disabled and unemployed in the reforestation program. This resolution provides that veterans be given preference, first, those who are disabled and whose benefits will be stopped or substantially reduced under the provisions of the Economy Act; second, to veterans who are now unemployed and have dependents, and, third, to those not coming within the above two classes. I want the RECORD to show that I am whole-heartedly in favor of that resolution.

I do not desire to criticize those who labored for the passage of the economy bill nor do I wish to condemn those who voted for the measure. I voted against the bill for I thought then that the provisions were too drastic and severe and that disabled veterans would be unable to receive fair, just, and equitable treatment. I know now, since the regulations have been put into effect, that my fears for the veterans were justified. I am convinced that many injustices have resulted from the passage of the Economy Act, and this resolution, sponsored by the Honorable JED JOHNSON of Oklahoma, will, in a measure, alleviate some of the suffering and go a long way toward restoring to the needy veteran his chance of subsistence. I join the disabled veterans of Oklahoma in endorsing House Concurrent Resolution 17.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

REFERENCES TO DOCUMENTS OFFERED IN EVIDENCE

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, before we proceed this morning may I be permitted to say that the honorable Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] yesterday requested counsel to indicate the pages of the printed record where documents are contained that had been offered in evidence. In obedience to that request I should like to report that the general report and account of the receivers is to be found at page 419. The first report of the receiver on claims is found at page 458. The application of the attorneys for compensation is found at page 703.

The references I am giving are references to the bound volume of exhibits that has been referred to here.

The application of receiver for compensation is found at page 600 of that volume. The report of the receiver on claims is found at page 778. The second account of the receiver is found at page 542. The second application for attorney's fee is found at pages 749 and 775. The second application for receiver's fees is found at page 499.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in addition to the matters just referred to by counsel I am wondering if the report of the receiver in the Russell-Colvin case, which was not printed at this hearing, is available in one of the other reports.

Mr. LINFORTH. It is available in the printed record to which I have referred at the page which I have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The managers on the part of the House may proceed with the argument.

ARGUMENT ON BEHALF OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES BY MR. MANAGER BROWNING

Mr. Manager BROWNING. Mr. President, I desire to consume 1 hour of the time, and will appreciate it if I may be advised 5 minutes before the time expires.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well.

Mr. Manager BROWNING. Mr. President and members of the High Court of Impeachment, in the opening statement in this case the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] set out at some length the theory of the managers with regard to impeachment procedure. I only wish to supplement that with the statement that we regard an impeachment action as a defensive measure guaranteed to the people under the Constitution; that we regard the tenure of office of the Federal judiciary as a political right and not an inalienable right guaranteed under the Constitution to an individual. We regard it not only as a defensive action but as an action which has nothing to do with punitive, retributive, or vindictive justice, because the Constitution clearly sets out that the limit of punishment which can be administered by the Senate is removal from office and a denial of the privilege of holding office thereafter. The framers of the Constitution very wisely saw that in the future some men would be appointed to that high office whose conduct would not be good, and therefore they provided that it would be a tenure for life or during good behavior.

We come to a consideration of the facts in this investigation. So far as I am concerned, the particular individual under investigation is a matter of indifference. But the respondent in this case we discover at the outset conducting his office in such a way that the bar association of the city of San Francisco, Calif., representing the major part of that district, requests an investigation of his official conduct, because, as they set out, of the unfavorable notoriety that has been given to his actions connected therewith.

One of the circumstances that we propose to call to your attention, and which is embodied in the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House and shown by the proof, is the residence of the respondent. Briefly, I desire to recite to you that in September 1929, because of developments about which we have no concern, the respondent left home and decided to take up a residence elsewhere. He went to the Fairmont Hotel in San Francisco. He was a Federal judge occupying the district bench. He went there to remain, as the proof shows, and he has remained practically ever since, but he did not register in his own name. The room that he occupied was not occupied at that time, as shown by the circumstance that registration was made on that date by W. S. Leake for a guest for room 26, Fairmont Hotel, and the guest a resident of San Francisco, and the respondent has occupied that room exclusive of all other parties ever since that time.

You have heard his statement with regard to what his intentions were after that time, or in April after he went there in September, of establishing a residence in Contra Costa County. Intention is a presumption of law founded on fact. If I say to an individual, "I would not harm you for the world", and straightaway I shoot him through the heart, do you consider that my intention would be what I said or what I did? Our position is that his intention must be defined by his action. He claims to have established a residence in Contra Costa County on April 6 or April 17—whichever he insists is the proper time—in 1930, and from that date to this time he has spent 4 nights in that residence. The maid at the hotel says he is regularly at the hotel and he admits it. I take it that is a fair inference from his statement. Nobody else occupies his room, and for all that length of time—more than 3 years—he boasts of having lived in the residence 4 nights and claims that is his legal residence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. Manager BROWNING will suspend for a moment. The Chair appoints the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] as Presiding Officer.

(Thereupon Mr. VAN NUYS took the chair as Presiding Officer.)

Mr. Manager BROWNING. What other circumstance is connected with this matter? The fact that he made his tax returns in San Francisco and admitted on the stand that he signed an affidavit on each of those returns that his residence was the same "as set out above", and in 1930 and 1932, at least those two I remember definitely, he swore that he was a resident of San Francisco City and San Francisco County, Calif. In my judgment this proposition of residence is exactly as he stated before the committee, as the proof shows, when he was here last January and said that he was contemplating a civil action and wanted to have the privilege of moving it to Contra Costa County if it was brought against him. He said "I firmly believe, gentlemen, if it had not been that I went over there and had that claim for residence, that suit would have been brought against me, and if I had registered in the hotel it would have been a circumstance against my residence in the other place." In effect that is what he said. In other words, he stayed at the hotel as much as he would have had he been registered, yet he, a judge on the bench, undertook to build up a fictitious, hyphenated, fly-by-night residence across the bay to defeat civil action against him in San Francisco.

It is these circumstances, connected with others to which we propose to call your attention, that we insist precipitated an investigation of this man occupying the high place of Federal judge in the northern district of California.

When he got ready to make up this fictitious residence situation and to cover up his living at the Fairmont Hotel—regardless of what his purpose might have been, that is the truth of what happened—he turned to one man that the record shows had been his confidant, had been his crony, had been his constant companion in evenings at the hotel before and after that time since 1925. It was his habit, with this man, to come in there in the evenings, and they would go apart from other people and sit and talk, almost constantly. That is the testimony of the auditor of the hotel in which it occurred.

Who is this man in whom he was confiding? In my judgment he is the man behind the curtain that was pulling the strings on this puppet of his, and the record justifies that assertion. There is only one man in the record that has opened his mouth about the reputation of Sam Leake around San Francisco, and that was brought out by inquiry by a member of the court. You will recall when Mr. Ehrmann was on the stand some Senator asked him by way of an interrogatory, "Have you heard Sam Leake discussed around San Francisco?" He said, "Yes; quite a bit." "What have you heard said about him?" In the most significant way that a man could answer he said, "If I were called upon to answer that inquiry categorically, I would say I have not heard him praised."

That, members of the court, is the record so far as the character of this man is concerned; but there is other testimony that indicates more than that his interest in this puppet of his.

For instance, for some reason unexplained in the record, Sam Leake decided that somebody might be following the judge; why? I do not know. That is not explained. What did he do? As a friendly act, he employed a private detective to see whether that was going on.

For what purpose can a Federal judge be shadowed? And why was it this man's interest to see whether or not he was being shadowed? And Leake paid for it out of his own money.

Those are just some of the circumstances connected with the contacts and the relationships of these two men; and, although that is the case, W. S. Leake made an effort in his original testimony to deny that he knew the habits of the judge, to deny that he knew where he lived. It will be found on page 219 of this record. That is, he would not answer that question when it was asked. He said, "He sleeps sometimes at the Fairmont Hotel"; and there was a labored effort on his part to conceal the information that he had regarding the matter. He claimed he did not know respondent's habits or where he lived.

There is no question in this record of the Siamese twins relationship between these two parties, and it becomes very important in view of the things that developed in the cases that have been unfolded before you.

In the first place, while the respondent was on the State bench he appointed W. S. Leake receiver or appraiser in eight different cases in the year 1927, which was the last full year of his service. In one of those, as to which you have heard testimony, the only one where we have exact information about the fees, it is shown that Leake signed his name and got pay for 100 days' service in appraising property, and was paid $500 for it. He had associated with him in that case one Guy H. Gilbert, who has appeared before you. He signed his name to the report and to the oath, and for signing his name twice he got, by allowance of the respondent, $500—$5 a day for 100 days' work. But when the respondent came into the Federal court W. S. Leake was not appointed receiver any more, yet somewhere along there he had been borrowing money from the judge several times, and the judge was not certain—you could see it from his attitude and his statement on the stand—whether Leake ever paid it back, but he said he thought he had. At one time Leake borrowed as much as $350. After the judge came into the Federal court he did not appoint Leake to any receiverships; but our theory of this case is, and I think I can establish it from the record, that Leake got his compensation from some other source, and the judge—to use the vernacular of the day—got Leake "off his back" and on the pay roll of crippled institutions that came to his court for protection.

The first case in which Mr. Gilbert was appointed was the Stempel-Cooley case, in which he collected $12,000, and got a $500 fee. He went to Mr. Leake as soon as he was appointed in that case and asked whom to name for his attorney, and Leake told him John Douglas Short, and Gilbert named him.

The next case that Mr. Gilbert got was the Sonora Phonograph Co. case. He thought he was going to name John Douglas Short in that case as soon as he got word of his appointment; but when he got to the court room he found out differently. There enter the firm of Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel. They are there and ready to receive this appointment as attorneys for the receiver.

Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel had filed the petition in that case. Dinkelspiel so states in his testimony, on page 594 of the hearings. There happens to be a rule that the respondent has introduced in this case and has offered an explanation of it by Judge St. Sure. It is printed on page 627 of the record; and the rule, quoted in this letter, is as follows:

Receivers shall employ counsel only after obtaining an order of the court therefor.

And then Judge St. Sure's explanation is this:

It gives the court discretion in the matter of the appointment of attorneys for the receiver, to the end that no attorney shall be appointed who for good and sufficient reasons is deemed disqualified—who has appeared for or acts for a party or for any creditor of the defendant (whether intervener or not), or for any other person interested in the cause or the estate.

In defiance of that rule, of which he offers an explanation in having Judge St. Sure say that no attorney shall be appointed who stands in that relationship, at his own discretion or his own insistence he tells Gilbert, or somebody tells him, that he must take Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel, who filed the petition and represented creditors in this case; and there is a strong inference in this record that they got into the case by methods that are not considered altogether orthodox or ethical by the legal profession. Be that as it may, however, the case lasted either 6 or 7 months.

Dinkelspiel says that they set forth in their report all the services they rendered, and he says that on page 595 of the record. That report shows that Dinkelspiel spent 65 hours of work in that case, and he says that is all of it; so for 9 days of 7 hours a day, and 2 hours additional, he received the sum of $20,000, and he received that over the protest of every party in interest in the case, and he received it by grant of authority from the respondent.

Think of that, gentlemen of the Senate! Sixty-five hours' work; a crippled institution going into receivership for the protection of equity, and then having their assets dissipated in any such manner as that. I ask you if that is conduct becoming a man holding that high office.

Not only that; the Dinkelspiels undertake to show that they are specialists. John Dinkelspiel testifies that they specialize in equity and bankruptcy proceedings.

"Well, Mr. Dinkelspiel, how many cases outside of the four given you by the respondent have you had?"

"Two."

"What fees did you receive?"

"In one of them, $2,000; in the other, less than $2,000."

A specialist? Of course he is, so far as the respondent's court is concerned; and this is not the only case in which he served. Why, gentlemen of the Senate, he received over $2,000 a day for the service he rendered; and I ask you, sitting as members of the high Court of Impeachment, if that is justified in a court of equity when a crippled institution comes there for protection of the law? There was not a single claim that went to litigation; there was not a single lawsuit instituted or tried; and 65 hours of service was rendered!

Mr. Gilbert in that case got $6,800, a large part of which he put in his safe-deposit box; and we will come back to trace that later.

The next case on which I want to touch is one that I think has taken up too much time in this record, I admit, and that is the Russell-Colvin matter. I am trying to discuss these cases in the order in which they occurred in court.

Of course, the Russell-Colvin case is the only one of which the respondent offers even a vestige of an explanation. He claims that he had suspicions about the way that case was brought; and that, in my judgment, is the only case in which he offers any excuse for what he did. We are not relying on that alone, but we do think our theory of that case is correct, and I will tell you why.

This was a brokerage concern. They were suspended from operation by the San Francisco Stock Exchange. If there had been any defalcations, if there had been any corrupt practices that the exchange had known about, they would not have been suspended; they would have been expelled. The record does not show that there was any misconduct so far as fraud or corruption was concerned, on the part of the members of the concern itself. The parties came into court for a receivership to see if they could not work out the situation and sell the concern as a whole. On the threshold we are met with the proposition with which the respondent undertakes to excuse himself, and that is the double filing in that case.

I say to you that the record proves that that is not an unusual occurrence. We will come to the Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association case in a little bit. The testimony of Tom Slaven showed that there was a double drawing in that case; and it was not an unusual thing at all. They drew first, and they drew Judge St. Sure, and he was out of town; so they drew again, and drew Judge Louderback. That is to be found on page 367 of the record. So it was not an unusual thing; and I believe the statement of these men when they say that they went out the day before, and they placed a petition on the desk, and Judge St. Sure's name was drawn, and they knew he was out of town, and they say the clerk told them, or someone—they do not say that Maling said it, but it is a fair inference from this record that someone in the clerk's office told them—that Judge St. Sure would not act in his absence, and no one would act for him in his absence. The clerk says that no one ever has acted in a receivership in the absence of the judge drawn since he has been clerk, from 1912. So the next morning the parties came out, and to avoid that they made a double filing, and, as it occurred, Judge St. Sure's name was drawn first, and he was out of town; and then immediately they filed the other one, and they drew Judge Louderback.

If there had been any effort to control somebody, why did they not dismiss that petition? The truth of the matter is that was an afterthought and a fictitious excuse built up after the development of this case. So they drew Judge Louderback, and they went to his quarters and recommended a man about whom there can be no question in this record with regard to his ability to carry on the business, and they presented him. Then afterward, the vital point in the matter with me, so far as the excuse of the respondent is concerned, is that he claims that he told that man to come back that day after he qualified. There are four witnesses besides Strong who swear positively that he did not do it, and none of them is impeached in this record except by the testimony of the respondent himself. There were five of them, if you please, including Strong. Strong and all those other witnesses say that nothing had ever been said about the attorneyship in that matter until after Strong qualified, and he had no idea, and the preponderance of the proof shows it, that he was expected to come back that evening; but he did talk to McAuliffe, and he said, "I was employing McAuliffe personally, and not the firm of Heller, Ehrmann, White & McAuliffe." There are two men in that town who are specialists on stock-brokerage matters, and they are McAuliffe and Lloyd Ackerman. When he came back the court began to talk to him about his lawyer; and when he told the court that he had talked to Mr. McAuliffe, the witness Strong knew, and everybody connected with the case knew, of rule 53, and they knew that no attorney could be appointed without the approval of the court. Everybody in the record understood that. Nobody contends anything different. When it was revealed to the respondent that he had actually talked to an attorney who was counsel for the stock exchange, then he said, "That is just what I was afraid of."

Was he undertaking at that time to get a competent counsel or was he afraid of the stock exchange? This record shows that the exchange had but one interest in the matter, and that was the proper and equitable and economical administration of this estate in favor of the creditors. That was the only thing that could affect them, because the seat on the exchange was security for any claims any members had against it, which claims totaled $1,200, and the seat was worth $75,000 at that time. They could not have had any other interest; and common, ordinary sense would have dictated that they could not. But they had made an estimate, or they did make an estimate, of what the legal services would amount to in the case if they handled it, and they estimated then it would not exceed $20,000, and that the receivership fee would not exceed $15,000.

Let us see if there was not a scheme. I will tell you what my theory is. I think the respondent and Leake and those who are bloodsuckers on these estates had known about this in advance—there is some evidence to that effect—and when they came in with such a competent receiver, and one so unanimously supported, they decided that perhaps they would have to take him, but that they would get what patronage they could out of the attorneyship. To show you that the respondent was stalling, that he was undertaking to put every obstacle in the way of this appointment, he required of this man a bond of $50,000 to run in favor of other creditors of the concern, such a bond as was never heard of in any other case, and the only thing it could have been for was to try to hamper him in his qualifications. Then he decided that perhaps he had gone too strongly in the matter and that he would cut it down to $10,000; but he still required it. For what purpose? For nothing in the world except to find some excuse to get out of appointing Strong as receiver.

When Strong came back, the respondent made the insistence that he had not come back the afternoon or the evening before; and Strong explained to him that he had not understood—or the other attorneys explained that that was not the understanding—that Strong had not done it in violation of anything he understood was his duty and his obligation to the court.

Now listen. The respondent fired Strong and appointed H. B. Hunter. Just before he put Hunter in he called in three of these attorneys, Thalen and Marrin and Brown, and told them that he was going to fire Strong, and he said: "I offered him as his attorney Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, and he would not have them; I offered him Sullivan, Sullivan & Roche, and he would not have them; and I offered him Cushing & Cushing, and he would not have them." Why did he stop there? You know from this record that he fired Strong because he would not appoint John Douglas Short as his attorney; and here he was, 5 minutes before he was going to fire Strong, telling these attorneys whom he had offered him, but he said not one word about having offered him John Douglas Short. Does that have any significance to you? Of course, he was building up a pretext for his action, and he knew then that the controversy between him and Strong was over the appointment of one man, and one man alone, and that was a law clerk in the office of Keyes & Erskine getting $200 a month, with a thousand dollars a year, possibly, that he made outside of that—$3,400 in all at the outside. Yet he was the only man in San Francisco of that great bar whom he could select to carry on this matter.

In my judgment, that is all this case deserves in the way of attention with regard to the facts in the limited argument we are undertaking to make to you, except that at the termination of this case the attorneys showed that Short had put in 1,407 hours on their application for a fee, that Erskine had put in 329 hours, and that for that amount of service they were given $46,250 out of this estate, and that the receiver was given $33,000.

They finally said that there were about 5 lawsuits filed in this case, and I think perhaps 1 of them went to trial. It was an administrative matter; it was accounting work, mostly, and for work as an accountant, which was most of the service Mr. Short claims he rendered, he has been paid over $150 a day for his services, and part of that 3 or 4 days, as you will see if you will look at that account, is charged up to the estate for time he put in compiling his account to justify a fee and for his attendance in court to defend it. This estate had to pay him $150 a day for that kind of work. The biggest service he rendered in the case was the compilation of the account he filed to justify that fee, and I want you to peruse it in the record if you please. He put down one sixth of an hour for a telephone call, 15 minutes for dictating a letter, and every movement he made he had to keep a diary entry of, and he charged for that time. That is the greatest service rendered in the case.

It turned out, at last, that on account the attorneys in the case had been allowed $51,250 and the receiver $40,500 for less than 2 years solid work on the part of either one of them. The receiver, before he went there, was getting $600 a month, and we have not been shown that he is getting anything since the receivership. The attorney was getting $200 a month. For the kind of service I have indicated from a wounded institution, the respondent allowed those exorbitant fees and took the lifeblood of people who were the claimants against this estate. They can tell you all they please about the size of it, but two thirds of this estate, or over half of it, at least, was property they held as bailor and bailee, and all they had to do was to return it to the parties who owned it.

The general creditors who had claims and who were not paid in full got $161,000. For the cost of administration the estate paid over $141,000. That is the picture. If they had gotten $10,000 more for administration, they would have split half and half, 50-50, with the creditors of that institution.

I want to mention briefly the Golden State Asparagus case, because in stepped the Dinkelspiels again, the specialists in receiverships, who had 4 under Judge Louderback and 2 from every other source.

The Golden State Asparagus Co. was another wounded institution. The parties finally agreed on Mr. Edwards as the receiver, and he was appointed. Then the respondent said, "I will give you a list of attorneys from which you can select your attorney." The list consisted of Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel. That is the great list in his life. So Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel were selected, and they went in to administer this estate. The first year they were allowed $14,000 for their services, and their legal services on this account, as shown in this record, were similar to those that had been rendered for the company over a period of several years, and they were little in excess in amount of what had been rendered, except procuring court orders. The legal services theretofore had cost that concern $679 per year, on an average, for 5 years. Yet the first year in the respondent's court Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel received $14,000 on account, and of course they are expecting other fees, assessed against an institution that has not anything but a lot of canned asparagus, which they cannot sell. The fee has not been fully paid, because they do not have the money with which to pay it. But the bill is there, and that institution is going to be closed out some day, and that will be a preferred claim, of course, against the estate. That fee was allowed over the protest of everybody in interest in the case who was in court.

See this picture, with the respondent on the bench, these people interested in the administration of the estate coming up and saying, "That is an excessive fee. The institution cannot stand that kind of a charge." And when one of them, a lawyer at the bar, would object to the fee, the court, in a peremptory manner, as is shown by the testimony here, would say, "You take the stand, and I will swear you and see what you testify."

The only witness shown by the record to have testified was one who said that an ample charge for that service would be $6,000. Of course, an effort is made to show that the creditors agreed to the large fee allowed. They had to, because they tell you that is the very best they could get, because they knew the attitude of the respondent in regard to these fees when they were going to certain firms and certain individuals in his court. That is the record in the Golden State Asparagus Co. case.

The next case that came along was the Prudential Holding Co. case. To my mind, what was done in that case was the most outrageous and inexcusable act on the part of respondent which appears in this record. An unknown attorney, whom he had never seen before, came up from Los Angeles to San Francisco and went to the office of Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel to meet a renegade vice president of the Prudential Holding Co., who had nothing to do with its operation, who knew nothing about its circumstances, and had been in the office but one time he could think of in many, many months. He said that he was in there about 2 days before. I ask you to read the statement of James H. Stephens, that vice president, and you can determine from that whether or not he knows anything at all about this or any other business. I think he was the exemplification of the dumbest individual I ever heard testify, and his testimony will show that he was.

This unknown attorney went into the respondent's court and said, "Here is a petition", and that petition on its face shows without any doubt in the world that this Federal court had no jurisdiction of that case. There was no diversity of citizenship, and it is as plain as it can be written on the face of any petition. The court read that petition, and yet that petition was only certified to on information and belief by the attorney in the case. He did not pretend to know the facts.

What did Stephens say to supplement that affidavit on information and belief? He said, "I think something ought to be done." That is as strong as he ever made it. All of us who were in business about that time thought that something ought to be done about it, but under those circumstances, and with that meager showing, the respondent granted a receivership in that case.

Whom did he appoint? Action was taken, it is shown, around 12 o'clock. It takes 40 minutes to get across the bay, yet at 10 minutes before 1 Guy H. Gilbert and John W. Dinkelspiel showed up at the office of the Prudential Holding Co. in Oakland, armed with the authority of the court, took charge of the business, turned out the secretary, and put a padlock on the door.

Now follow it a little further. That was on a Saturday. The following Monday the Prudential Holding Co. came in, by its reputable counsel, and objected to that receivership, and called the court's attention to the fact that it was shown on the face of the petition there was no jurisdiction in his court, that Stephens had not represented the company, and that those who had taken charge of the company were trespassers and had no right in there at all. Then there was a long period of stalling, time granted for filing additional arguments, and points, and authorities, and you find the Prudential Holding Co. coming in and asking for the case to be set down for hearing. The petition was filed on the 15th of August, and finally, on the 5th day of September, a petition designed to put the institution into bankruptcy was filed in the bankruptcy branch of the court, and was assigned to Judge St. Sure. The only ground alleged for bankruptcy—now get this—the only ground alleged for bankruptcy was the existence of the equity receivership, and not another ground was alleged. Then, on the 30th of September, 25 days after this petition was filed, all at once it had to be heard. Judge St. Sure was out of town, and the respondent went into Judge St. Sure's court. He appointed Guy H. Gilbert receiver in bankruptcy, and he appointed Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel his attorneys in bankruptcy. Then, 2 days later, he dismissed the equity receivership on the ground that there was no jurisdiction.

I ask if there is any suspicious action on the part of the respondent or whether he is being persecuted when managers on the part of the House bring you that testimony? I am telling you that it is inexcusable. They undertook to lug in here by Kreft the proposition that additional grounds of bankruptcy were alleged, but no petition for that purpose was filed until the 14th day of October following his action on the 30th of September. It is inexcusable; it stands unexplained in this record, and I repeat that it was an effort on the part of the respondent to hold his leeches onto a wounded institution and let them suck its blood—his pets and his coadjutors, so far as the administration of the receivership in bankruptcy is concerned in the northern district of California. There is no other way to explain it.

What happened to that petition in bankruptcy? Judge St. Sure came back home, and promptly dismissed it the first time it was called to his attention. Then those in interest came in and filed the petition to rehear his action in dismissing that petition. He sat there on the bench, and said, in effect at that time, "No, I am not going over this any further; there is a bad smell about the whole thing"; and that was the end of it, and out went Gilbert and Dinkelspiel.

There is another case I want to call to your attention briefly. But one more thing occurred with regard to that case just discussed. The proof shows that as a result of all this action this institution struggled along of its own volition until April or May of this year, after the dismissal of this petition in 1931, and then it was forced to go into receivership again because of the adverse notoriety and publicity given it on account of these cases that were brought without justification, and I charge with the connivance of the respondent in the effort to try to favor those to whom he was undertaking to give a fee. That was the termination of the case, and it is now on receivership in the State of Nevada.

The next thing I want to mention is the Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association. In the beginning, I want to call your attention to the fact that this is a case where the respondent utterly defied the plain statute law of the State and the rights of a State official and then utterly defied the circuit court of appeals, which reversed him and told him the State officials were right and he was wrong.

The petition in the Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association case was filed in his court. After a few days' delay a hearing was had; there was a temporary receiver appointed, and he selected Samuel Shortridge, Jr., as the receiver and Marshall Woodworth as his attorney.

There was something peculiar about that selection, because when Tom Slaven, representing the defendant company, went out with Reisner, representing the plaintiff, in one of the conversations—and he thinks it was with the judge's secretary, and it is not denied—he was handed a slip of paper with three names on it, with the understanding that he was to select one of those as receiver in this case, and there was only one of them he had ever heard of, and that was Samuel Shortridge, Jr. But, of course, he knew what had to be done, because that was the wish of the court. That is the picture, undenied, except Reisner said he did not see the slip. Well, he did not have to see it for it to be there. Then it was that it developed on the stand that Marshall Woodworth said, "I talked to Shortridge about it within 3 or 4 days before the petition was filed." Then he said, "I went and talked to Judge Louderback before the petition was filed to see if he would select me as counsel for Shortridge as receiver, and he said he would." So the thing was fixed in advance, not by the parties in interest, not by the commissioner of insurance of the State of California, but by the respondent and Samuel Shortridge and Marshall Woodworth.

So the case was filed; but, mind you, before that, 4 days before this suit was brought, the Commissioner of Insurance for the State of California had actually taken charge of the assets under the statute of that State and was administering them; he had all his force on a salary, and there was not any charge against the estate except the fees ordinarily charged for operating in the State; there would not have been any expense of administration so far as they were concerned; but then, as soon as this petition was filed and the claim of the State commissioner was set up, the respondent issued a mandatory injunction and ordered him to bring everything in and turn it over to the receiver of the Federal court, although the State receiver, acting under a plain statute of the State, had been operating for 4 days at that time.

Now, to go further with the story. It was contested at every step of the way by the commissioner of insurance, represented by Mr. Frank L. Guereña. When the first hearing was had, Delger Trowbridge came in as a member of the Industrial Accident Commission and showed to the court that after the claim that had been allowed by him originally for Helen Lay on which the petition was based, a petition to rehear had been filed; they had revoked their former action, and the claim stood then disallowed, and was not a claim against the estate at all. That was at the first hearing. With that information the respondent continued this receivership, knowing it was based on that claim that had been absolutely eliminated, and he had knowledge of it at that time. You will find a full statement of that in Delger Trowbridge's testimony.

There came a controversy over the whole situation, and this respondent undertook to protect not the estate, not the money that came in, but Samuel Shortridge, Jr., and Marshall Woodworth, his appointees. I will show you why I say that. He allowed exorbitant expenses and he allowed $6,000 fees to each one of them. Mr. Guereña took his appeal. There were several circumstances I wish I had time to relate, but I cannot, showing that he absolutely blocked or tried to block the appeal of this case, and worked in every way he could through his office to cooperate with Woodworth and his office, even going to the extent of notifying the circuit court of appeals that Guereña was on his way over there, and to let Woodworth know when he got there. Woodworth called them after Guereña left respondent's chambers, and he could not have his information from any source except the respondent's office. The respondent did everything he could do to block the appeal. The appeal was taken, and the circuit court of appeals reversed the respondent, not in part, not on certain things, but entirely reversed him, on the ground that the State court and the State commissioner of insurance were the sole authority in the matter, and that there was no ground for the Federal court to appoint a receiver at all. Then that order came down, that mandate from the circuit court came to the respondent, and it was an outright reversal and an order to turn over everything. But he had allowed the $6,000 fee to Shortridge and the $6,000 fee to Woodworth. Listen to what he put in that order.

Provided, however, that if within 30 days from the signing and filing of this order the attorney for E. Forrest Mitchell, State insurance commissioner of California and receiver, appointed by the State court of California as above stated, shall appeal from this order, then the further execution and performance by said receiver of this order shall be stayed until the final action by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit on said appeal or until the other or further order of this court or of the circuit court of appeals.

In other words, he attached that condition to the plain mandate of the circuit court. He admits now that it was an error, of course, but what excuse does he offer? He said, in substance, that Marshall Woodworth trapped him into making that order. What does Marshall Woodworth say about it? He says, on the contrary, "I did no such thing; I told him then that Guereña was going to appeal this case or was threatening to do so, and the order was made for that reason." What reason? For no other reason in the world except to try to deter Guereña in that appeal and try to coerce him into giving up his appeal; to try to keep him from appealing from the allowance of these fees. If that is not in defiance of the law of the land, if that is not conduct unbecoming a district judge, then I do not know how to picture it. There is no excuse for it. The respondent does not plead ignorance. He says it was an error, and he knew it was an error, but when did he change it? He finally modified that order by stipulation some time later, after the appeal had been perfected and had gone to the circuit court and he got uneasy about it. In other words, it did not accomplish the purpose; it did not prevent the appeal on these fees; it did not keep this money in the pockets of his associates. Therefore he would reverse his action and change his order.

Can anyone maintain that official conduct of that character is conduct becoming a Federal judge? Was it not enough to arouse the people over whom was placed a man to serve on the bench for life or during good behavior? Is there cause for surprise that the Bar Association of California asked to be relieved of this man who would make an order of that kind, for no other excuse in the world except to favor those whom he had appointed to receiverships and attorneyships and to whom he had allowed exorbitant fees? I will leave it with the Senate to determine whether they think that is conduct becoming a Federal judge.

This man Marshall Woodworth appeared in one other case in this court.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair wishes to call the attention of the manager to the fact that he has only 5 minutes remaining.

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. Mr. President, may I yield out of my time 10 additional minutes to Mr. Manager BROWNING?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. Manager BROWNING will have 10 minutes additional.

Mr. Manager BROWNING. I thank my colleague.

There is one further thing in regard to Mr. Woodworth in this case, and that is that in a former appointment he rendered 2 months' service and got an allowance or fee of $500 from the referee who knew all about the case and had heard it. Then it was that Mr. Woodworth, being dissatisfied, appealed to the respondent and was allowed $2,000, an increase of $1,500.

Mr. Woodworth is a man who has for a long time known Sam Leake. Mr. Woodworth associated with him over a long period of years and admits his obligation to him. He says he visits his office. How many people in this record so far have not had intimate acquaintance or been in close connection with the respondent through Sam Leake or in other ways than in his court? The Dinkelspiels deny that they were acquainted with him, but their father back of them was that connection, and he was there when in the first instance the appointments were made in the Sonora case; and it was through him that the relationship existed. This record is plain on that.

Not only that, but there are very few witnesses in this record who do not have safe-deposit boxes. I want to call attention to that. Gilbert has one. That is very suspicious; and we want to call attention to some facts after a while that will show why the suspicion rests on the safe-deposit box had by him and by several other witnesses in this case. And they had money in them, too; do not forget that.

Now there is one other case I want to mention, and that is the Fageol Motors case. I will be as brief as I can. In that case another institution got into trouble, a great motor company with a capital and assets of $3,000,000, with its activities spreading over four States. They wanted to apply for a receivership. This is the kind of conduct people have a right to be suspicious of on the part of the respondent, in addition to his appointments. Now, let us trace that. They came into his court with a petition recommending a certain man for receiver because he was thoroughly acquainted with every branch of the automotive industry. Here comes Wainwright and here comes Roy Bronson and other witnesses and say, "We went to the judge's chambers to see him at the noon hour and his secretary said"—and this is undisputed, although, of course, the respondent undertakes to hide behind her by saying she never passed the word on to him. She told him everything else except the thing he wants the court to think she did not tell him. They went in there and she said, "He will be off the bench late and you will have to come back at 1:30." They left the papers and explained that they wanted her to arrange a hearing and told her who the man was they had selected for receiver, and she assured them their message would be delivered to the judge.

They came back at 1:30 and she said, "Why, the judge got off earlier than he thought and he is out at present and will not be back until 2:30. If you will come back at 2:30, he will give you a hearing." There is no mistake about that. They came back at 2:30 and passed the respondent out in the hall walking away, and when they got inside the secretary said, "He has already appointed the receiver in that case." "Who did he appoint?" "G. H. Gilbert." "Who is he?" "I don't know." "Where does he live?" "I don't know." "What is his telephone number?" "I don't know, but I will try to get it for you and phone it to you after you get to the office." That was 2:30. They walked back to their office. Gilbert said the judge's secretary, the one that gave them that message, called him at 1:30 or 2 o'clock, or somewhere between those times, and told him he was appointed receiver, and yet she was standing there in the front of the judge's chambers and telling them she did not know where Gilbert lived or what his telephone number was. The truth of the matter is they wanted to stall these people off until he had time to qualify. When they went back to the office she called them in a few minutes and told them what the telephone number was. The record shows that was after Gilbert and his attorney Dinkelspiel had appeared and qualified, and they knew they had the estate tied up in the court.

Dinkelspiel called them and said, "Gilbert has been appointed receiver and I am his attorney." The first question was, "Has Gilbert qualified?" He said, "Oh, yes." Their purpose was that if he had not qualified they would dismiss the proceeding so as to get rid of him. The alternative was that they held a conference and said, "We will talk it over, and if they will not agree to cooperate and take our advice on how to run it we are going into bankruptcy", and they did have that conference the next morning. They told Gilbert to his face, "You are not qualified and you know nothing of the business at all." You remember that their own witness, Mr. Lunstrum, who was called in and represented as a man who could be believed, said he was hired to run the business because Gilbert knew nothing about it at all. He was put there for that purpose. Gilbert was attached to it as a bloodsucker and for no other purpose in the world. That is the truth about the appointment of that receiver and Dinkelspiel. They agreed to keep their fees down or they would go into bankruptcy.

The termination of it was that the matter did go into bankruptcy, and this is the one case where the court can determine by comparison between the ideas of the respondent and of other people as to what his friends are entitled to in the way of compensation. There was as much work done in this case as in the Sonora case and the Asparagus case, said Dinkelspiel. He got $20,000 in one and $14,000 on account in the other. It was a bigger case and required more work. When the referee in bankruptcy came to fix the fee he gave Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel $6,000 and he gave the receiver, Gilbert, $4,500.

Members of the court, that is as much time as I can devote to the discussion of the actual facts of the record, but I do want to call attention—and I will give the page and the amount and the date—to what occurred with regard to Sam Leake's account at the Fairmont Hotel. Sam Leake testified he made $2,400 a year and that was his only income. Let us see what it is.

Leake deposited in the hotel, that he uses as a bank, since the beginning of 1928, $29,725 and has drawn out in cash over $17,000. I do not know what he has done with it. The record does not reveal, but I do know and I want to call your attention to some very significant coincidences in connection with the record. When fees were paid in respondent's court, Leake's account bulged like the coming in of the tide.

Guy H. Gilbert, as receiver in the Sonora case, on February 26, 1930, got $1,556 as a fee. On February 26, 1930, Sam Leake deposited to his account in the Fairmont Hotel $250. That appears at page 464 of the record.

On May 12, 1930, Guy H. Gilbert, as receiver, drew a fee of $2,562.83. On May 17 Leake deposited in the Fairmont Hotel $550 to his account. Record, page 466.

Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel, attorneys for the receiver in the Sonora case, drew $15,249.43 on May 17, 1930. On May 17, 1930, Sam Leake deposited to his account in the Fairmont Hotel $400.

H. B. Hunter received a fee of $500 on June 14, 1930, and on that same date Leake deposited $50. On the 25th of that month he deposited $500.

Hunter on May 30, 1930, received a fee of $500, and Leake deposited on the 8th of the next month $80 and on the 9th of the next month $250.

Guy H. Gilbert, receiver in the Sonora case, got $2,855.64 on July 30, 1930. On July 31, 1930, Sam Leake deposited $100 in his account at the Fairmont Hotel.

Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel, as attorneys in the Sonora case, got $5,000 on July 30, 1930, and on July 31, 1930, Sam Leake deposited $700 in his account at the Fairmont Hotel.

H. B. Hunter got $500 on July 30, 1930, and on the 11th of the next month Leake deposited in his account at the hotel $400.

Hunter got $500 on August 30, 1930, and on September 2 Leake deposited $100 in his account at the Fairmont Hotel.

September 30 Hunter got $500 more and Leake deposited on that same day $315 in the Fairmont Hotel.

Sam Shortridge, Jr., receiver in the Lumbermen's Reciprocal case, got $3,000 on December 4, 1930, and on December 5, 1930, Leake deposited $600 in his account.

Marshall Woodworth got $3,000 on the same day, December 4, and on December 9 Leake deposited $250 more in the Fairmont Hotel.

Hunter got $500 on January 15, 1931, and on January 18 Leake deposited $500.

Sam Shortridge, Jr., got $3,000 on April 23, 1931. On April 25, 1931, Sam Leake deposited $550 in his account at the Fairmont Hotel.

Marshall Woodworth got $3,000 on April 23, 1931, and on May 18, 1931, Leake deposited $500 more.

Woodworth got $2,000 and the date is not exact, but he said sometime in the spring—March, April, or May, as I understand it—1931, and on May 29 of that same year Leake deposited $450 in his account at the Fairmont Hotel.

Keyes & Erskine got $5,000 on November 30, 1931, and on December 14, 1931, Leake deposited $400, and on December 15, 1931, he deposited $1,200.

Gilbert got $4,500, he said, some time in the summer—I think August of 1932. We can fix the date, because on August 17, 1932, Sam Leake deposited $700 in his account at the Fairmont Hotel.

Mr. President and members of the court, these are the facts as viewed by the managers. My insistence is—and I say this in closing—that the circumstances and the irrefutable facts of the record brand the respondent as a man totally destitute of the essential elements of judicial character, and as a man that those people of a sovereign State and a sovereign district should be relieved of. It is only a political right we are asking you to take away from him. I insist that under the circumstances of this record it would be unfair to let him sit in judgment over a people that have brought these circumstances and these facts to you and laid them on your conscience, to determine whether they shall be afflicted by an individual or whether they have a right to have someone administer justice in their courts of equity, their courts of bankruptcy, their courts of justice, about whom there is no suspicion and in whom they have confidence.

ADDITIONAL QUESTIONS PROPOUNDED TO THE RESPONDENT

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the manager has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, may I submit a parliamentary inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would it be now in order for a Senator to propound a written interrogatory to the respondent about his testimony?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think so. The case has been closed, as the Chair understands it, unless the Senate orders otherwise.

Mr. CONNALLY. I assumed it was proper in view of the usual court practice in matters of trial before juries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection on the part of the respondent, the Chair will admit the question.

Mr. LINFORTH. The respondent has no objection to answering any question put to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will propound his question.

Mr. CONNALLY. I send several interrogatories to the desk and ask that they may be propounded.

Mr. Manager BROWNING. We did not understand the request of the member of the court.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas requests permission to propound a question to the respondent. Counsel for the respondent make no objection. The clerk will propound the first question submitted by the Senator from Texas.

The legislative clerk read the first question, as follows:

Q. When testifying you said you had consulted Leake in the lobby of the Fairmont Hotel about appointing a receiver and he suggested Hunter, who was in the hotel at the time. Why did you consult Leake about selecting a receiver?

The RESPONDENT. Because I thought he could provide me with information. I was looking for a man of a particular type to represent that kind of an estate. I happened to meet him in the corridor, and I thought he was a man well informed and perhaps might be able to indicate to me someone who had those qualifications.

The legislative clerk read the next question, as follows:

Q. How did it happen that Hunter was in the hotel at the time? Was not this rather a remarkable coincidence?

The RESPONDENT. I do not know how Mr. Hunter happened to be in the hotel at that time; but he had been living at the Fairmont Hotel for some time, although I was not acquainted with him.

The legislative clerk read the next question, as follows:

Q. Did you not have an acquaintance in San Francisco? And, if so, did you not know anyone qualified to be appointed receiver?

The RESPONDENT. I probably would have ascertained from some source, if I had not secured it from Mr. Leake at that time, the information necessary to appoint another receiver. It just happens that I spoke to him, and got the information without going further. I considered this particular case an exceptional case in this, that it involved a stock-brokerage company, in which there is work to be done by a receiver far more extensive than in ordinary receiver-ship cases.

The legislative clerk read the next question, as follows:

Q. You had several acquaintances at the bar. Why did you not make an inquiry of them as to a receiver?

The RESPONDENT. I can only answer that I happened to go up there, not for the purpose of seeking Mr. Leake but I happened to see him in the corridor, and I made the inquiry of him, and I had him give me the information which I have testified to. I probably would have gone to other sources had I not happened to meet Mr. Leake in the corridor at that time. It was information that was not necessarily information coming from an attorney.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have one other question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas propounds another question, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read the next question, as follows:

Q. What time of day did you see Hunter?

The RESPONDENT. I think the time was about 5 o'clock, as I usually remained at my chambers until 5 o'clock or later.

The legislative clerk read the next question, as follows:

Q. Did you have any arrangements to meet Hunter in the hotel, or had you had any information from Leake that Hunter would be there?

The RESPONDENT. I had no information that Mr. Hunter was going to be there, nor had I any information that Mr. Leake was going to be there, although Mr. Leake is a man of usual habits, and he was usually to be found about that time at the hotel. He is not a man that goes out. When he has finished his work, somewhere around 3 o'clock in the afternoon, he leaves his office, and he usually is at the Fairmont Hotel from that time until the following morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That concludes the questions.

ARGUMENT OF WALTER H. LINFORTH, ESQ., ON BEHALF OF THE RESPONDENT

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, and you, gentlemen of the Senate, at the outset I desire to extend to you my thanks for the courteous treatment that I have received at the hands of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], who has been very considerate and very kind in regard to every request made of him by me relative to the stress under which we have been working in this matter.

I desire to say a word or two so that you will know why I am here. You no doubt have already formed the notion that the relation of attorney and client is what brought me here. In explanation of my appearance here, I wish to relate to you a story which takes me back some 45 years. At that time I was a clerk in the office of a real lawyer in the West—a lawyer of the name of Henry E. Heighton, a warm personal friend of our beloved President, Grover Cleveland. At that time it became necessary for us to employ an office boy; and a little chap about 12 years of age was employed by me in that capacity. Since then he has grown to the point where he is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, trial lawyers in the State of California, and he is the partner of the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

During these 45 years the relations between that man, Theodore J. Roche, and myself have been very warm and very affectionate. For some years, during the domestic troubles of the respondent, that gentleman has been his counsel, and that gentleman intended to represent him upon this proceeding; but, due to stress of trial work in the city of San Francisco, 4 days before the filing of the answer in this case, I was drafted by him in his place and as his substitute and under such conditions I could not say "no."

Those are the reasons and those are the conditions in which I have undertaken to do what little I could in the defense of the respondent upon the hearing of this matter.

At the outset it may not be amiss to have in mind the gravity of the charges here.

This proceeding affects not the money, not the liberty, not the life of the respondent. It goes further; it affects his honor. A conviction of these charges means what? Not only his removal from office but the stigma and the stain of the fact that he is prevented for all time, from now on, from ever holding an office of honor or trust within these United States. It goes further: In my humble judgment, it affects even his right to practice his profession as an attorney at law, because, if branded with the stigma that he is guilty of the charges brought against him, any court upon proper application will promptly disbar him.

So I say, and I respectfully maintain, that his whole future life, his whole future career, is in the hands of you gentlemen; for a conviction means that his honor has been destroyed and taken away.

May I inquire, What kind of a proceeding is this? Is it criminal in its nature? Is it quasi-criminal? Nobody seems to know. The authorities on the subject are not agreed. No one knows. No learned writer on the subject has told us the meaning or the definition of the charge of "high crimes and misdemeanors", charged against the respondent in these articles. Having been unable from my limited examination of the books to find any precise definition of that charge, I have invented, if I may be permitted to use that expression, a definition of my own.

The Constitution of this country provides that an appointment of this kind is for life, depending upon good behavior. So I have concluded, and I respectfully submit to you, that "high crimes and misdemeanors", so far as this proceeding is concerned, means anything which is bad behavior, anything which is not good behavior.

In my humble judgment this proceeding should be likened to a criminal one. When you come to vote you vote either guilty or not guilty. The question propounded to each one of you will be, "Is the respondent guilty or not guilty?"—the form of verdict rendered in a criminal trial and never the form of verdict rendered in a civil proceeding. So my deduction in the matter, respectfully submitted to you gentlemen, is that this proceeding, while not criminal, is in the nature and partakes of the character of a criminal proceeding.

That being so, it leads me to the next question that I desire respectfully to submit to you; and that is this: What is the degree of proof necessary in order to bring in a verdict of guilty in this case? If it is in the nature of a criminal proceeding, then the proof must satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt. I respectfully contend and maintain that, inasmuch as the proceeding is one which partakes of the character of a criminal proceeding, that is the measure of proof required of the learned managers prosecuting this charge.

If I am in error in that, surely then the rules applicable to civil cases apply, namely, that one holding the affirmative must at least bear and sustain the burden of proof, and must, in order to prevail, prove by a preponderance of the evidence the charges made.

Before I enter into a discussion of the evidence, which I intend to do, gentlemen, in the hope that any inadvertent statements made by the learned manager who has preceded me, may be dispelled, I intend to give you a reference to the testimony in support of each statement I advance, in the hope that I may be of some assistance to those who are sitting here now, and who may not have been here when the testimony itself was introduced.

Before entering upon a discussion of the evidence, I deem it right, I deem it helpful, and I deem it just, for you to have in mind a picture of the respondent before you start to consider the evidence which has been introduced here.

Now, who is the respondent? What does the record show? He is an American through and through. He comes from American stock, his father born in the State of Pennsylvania, and his mother born and reared in the State of California, both father and mother pioneers of that great State. It is from that kind of stock this respondent sprung.

Who is he? He is a lawyer and a gentleman, educated in the public schools of San Francisco, in the University of the State of Nevada, and in the Harvard Law School. He is not only an American by birth, but he is an American at heart, one of the first, when this country was in trouble, to come to the front. The uncontradicted testimony shows that on the second day after this country declared war he volunteered and enlisted. His service as a soldier terminated only when the war was over.

What happened after that? He was elected for a term of 6 years to the Superior Court of the State of California. Re-elected when that term was finished for an additional period of 6 years, 2 years of which he served. Then the honor was conferred upon him by his appointment to the Federal bench, which office he has occupied ever since. That is a brief picture of this respondent. Nobody says anything to the contrary.

Who is at the bottom of these charges? Four disgruntled attorneys, who, in my humble judgment, have misled the honorable managers in this proceeding. Bear in mind that 25 receiverships, bankruptcy and equity, have been pending before the respondent in the 5 years he has been on the Federal bench. In the Russell-Colvin case alone, there were 700 claimants and creditors, and, notwithstanding there were 25 or more of these proceedings before the respondent in the 5 years he has been on that bench, not a single creditor in any one of those proceedings has been brought here to point a finger of suspicion at the respondent, or to say a word against him.

As a carpenter is judged by his chips, so a man should be judged by his acts, and you have this respondent here, with the testimony of the clerk of the court as to 25 receivership proceedings before him, with 700 creditors alone in the Russell-Colvin case, but not one creditor, man or woman, in any one of those proceedings has been called here to say an ill word against the respondent in his handling of any of these matters.

There is a disgruntled firm of attorneys in San Francisco, a firm made up of 5, with 3 of them here as witnesses, the fourth of them in the city of Washington but not called. I say to the gentlemen who represent the other side, with great respect for all of them, that they have been misled by this firm of disgruntled attorneys.

What is the charge, the main charge, made against us? What charge is found in the "Russell-Colvin case", so-called? I read from the articles of impeachment, as follows: "That he did willfully, tyrannically, and oppressively discharge one Addison G. Strong, in the Russell-Colvin case, in his own personal interest, and at the instance, suggestion, or demand of one Sam Leake."

Those who have attended these sessions from beginning to end know there is not a word of truth in that charge. To those who have not attended these sessions I want to demonstrate—and I use that word advisedly—the falsity of that charge.

It is conceded by everyone interested in this proceeding that Mr. Strong, first appointed as receiver, was the regularly employed auditor of the San Francisco Stock Exchange. It is also conceded that in that capacity he had also served the bankrupt concern of Russell-Colvin Co. Bear in mind that the filing of these two petitions in this proceeding simultaneously, the double filing, as it has been referred to here, the first going to Judge St. Sure's court, the second going to Judge Louderback's court, caused the respondent to be suspicious and cautious. You remember the testimony of Attorney Marrin in regard to why such a thing as that, never having happened before in 30 years, was done.

What was Mr. Marrin's explanation? His explanation was that the clerk of that court, a man whom we all love and revere, who has been our clerk for many years, told him that Judge St. Sure was out of town, and that no other judge would act for him in his absence. That is the statement of my good friend Manager Browning this morning, that no other judge would act for him, and that was the reason for the double filing.

So that there may be no mistake about it, let me call your attention to just a line from the testimony of that witness.

Mr. McKELLAR. What page?

Mr. LINFORTH. I am referring to page 167.

We asked the clerk how long Judge St. Sure would be in Sacramento, and he told us for about a week. We then asked the clerk if one of the other judges, either Judge Louderback or Judge Kerrigan, would take up the petition in the absence of Judge St. Sure, and we were told by the clerk that they would not.

At page 179, gentlemen, in the cross-examination of that witness, the following occurred—and I am reading from the top of the page, Senator McKELLAR:

Can you tell us whether it was a man or a woman who gave you the information that no one would act without Judge St. Sure being present?—A. My recollection is that Mr. Maling himself gave us that information.

Q. That morning?—A. Yes; that morning.

That answers the suggestion of the learned manager made in his argument this morning that the name of Mr. Maling was not mentioned, and that it was not known what clerk gave the information.

Now, let us see what Clerk Maling had to say on the subject. We summoned him here by wire, as fast as we could get him, when we heard what the testimony of Mr. Marrin was on that subject. I now call your attention briefly to just a word on page 682 of the testimony of that gentleman. I read from the bottom of the page:

Q. Upon the filing of the first complaint in that matter, which the record here shows went to Judge St. Sure's department, did you then or at any other time tell him that no judge present would act for Judge St. Sure in such a matter during his absence?—A. I have no recollection of it, and I am satisfied that he is mistaken if he thinks I said that. He must have misunderstood me, because I never would have made such a statement to any counsel to that question or answer it in that way. I have never undertaken to say what any judge would do in the matter of making an order.

Q. According to your best recollection, no such conversation took place?—A. I am satisfied that if we had a conversation he misunderstood my statement, because I never would have said that.

Of course, that statement was not correct. It is similar to other statements made by other disgruntled attorneys, aiding and abetting those that I say are the originators of this proceeding, namely, those representing the San Francisco Stock Exchange. You Senators heard my friend, Mr. Manager Browning, this morning say that the Bar Association of San Francisco inaugurated these proceedings. He told just a half truth; he did not tell you that at the time these proceedings were initiated Florence McAuliffe, one of the firm of attorneys for the stock exchange, was the vice president of the bar association that initiated these proceedings. He did not tell you that Florence McAuliffe, the same gentleman, is now the president of that bar association.

Judge St. Sure tells you—I will not bother to read his letter, but will call your attention to it at page 627, wherein he says the practice always was in his absence or in the absence of Judge Louderback, one to act for the other. There is no dispute about that fact.

If that is the fact, and if the clerk of the court did not tell those people that the remaining judges could not or would not act, then what is the reason for the double filing? They put a question to the respondent when on the stand yesterday if they thought he was an "easy mark", and if that is why they picked him with this second filing. That is their language, not mine. The respondent answered, in substance, "I do not know what they thought, but if they thought I was that kind of a man they quickly found out they were mistaken."

I will not take the time to read the testimony of the deputy clerk of the court, Mr. Fouts, who tells you at page 680 that he ran the record back for 30 years, and found that never before had such an instance of double filing occurred in that court.

Mr. Maling, the clerk of that court, tells you that, to his recollection, such a thing never before happened in that court.

Mr. Manager Browning this morning asked if there was anything unusual in this filing which fell to Judge Louderback's court. Why did they not dismiss this suit and file another? But there is an easy answer to that. There is a limit to which people dare go. They went the limit in the filing of the two petitions, and they did not dare go farther.

Then they took the matter up with respondent—tried to have him appoint Mr. Strong; and the minute respondent found out about this double filing, he at once became cautious and suspicious; sent for the double filing, and refused to hear the proceeding assigned to his court unless and until they first dismissed that double filing. They agreed to dismiss but not until they heard respondent say he would accept and would appoint Mr. Strong as receiver. Having received that information, they then announced they would dismiss the first petition, which they did.

The court—and when I say "the court", Senators, I mean the respondent—told Mr. Strong when appointed he would be an officer of the court, not the representative of either party, and that he must consult him with reference to the employment of counsel. Mr. Marrin so testified. I read you just a word on that subject, and, Senators, I am reading from page 168, at the foot of the page:

The judge then said to Mr. Strong, "If you are appointed receiver by me, you realize that you will be an officer of the court, representing the court and not any of the parties; and if you are appointed as receiver, will you consult me with reference to the employment of your counsel?" Mr. Strong said that he would.

So, at the very inception of the matter, the respondent, as a careful judge, told Mr. Strong what his duties were and what he would have to do, and he acquiesced.

After telling him that, he told him, "When you are through qualifying, come back to see me."

My friends on the other side of this case said to you this morning that five witnesses denied the making of that statement. I challenge the production of the testimony of a single witness to that effect. Every witness examined admitted the judge made such a statement, and I will read you on that subject the testimony of their witness Lloyd Dinkelspiel. I read, Senators, from page 226—

I do not believe we had any further conversation until the judge said to Mr. Strong as we were going out, "After you have qualified, I want to see you," or "Come back and see me."

Could language be any plainer—"after you have qualified, come back and see me"—not next week, not tomorrow, but "after you have qualified, come back and see me"?

He did not return, but he makes the excuse he did not think the judge meant that night. That testimony, Senators, is at page 192. That answer was a miserable subterfuge. He knew the judge meant that night, and his cross-examination shows that he knew the judge meant that night, because he admits before they left the courthouse that very night he called the attention of the lawyers who were with him to the fact that the judge had told him to come back, and the lawyers said it would do the next morning. That testimony is at page 206, Senators. I will not stop to read it. He knew that he was violating the promise he had made to the judge; and in this connection please have in mind that although it was late in the evening, the clerk's office, where he qualified, was only 50 feet from the judge's chambers. The judge remained waiting for him until 6 o'clock. He ascertained from the clerk's office that he had gone and the clerk's office was closed. He promised the judge he would not employ counsel without consulting him, and he told the judge that none of the counsel present were his attorneys; at the time he so told the judge, Mr. Dinkelspiel, one of the firm of Heller, Ehrmann, White & McAuliffe, attorneys for the stock exchange, was present in the judge's chambers and heard what he had said. That is found on pages 209 and 210, Senators.

When we reached that point in the cross-examination of this witness, questions were propounded to him by one of the Senators—I think by Senator Long, of Louisiana—and I ask permission briefly to call your attention thereto. I will read just a word from pages 209 and 210 at about the middle of the page:

By Mr. LINFORTH:

Q. I understood you to say today that when you called on the judge on Thursday, the 13th, which was the day of your removal, he asked you whether McAuliffe told you not to resign.—A. He asked me if I had asked Mr. McAuliffe and if he advised me not to resign, and I said he did.

Q. And that was the fact, Mr. McAuliffe had advised you not to resign?—A. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I send a question to the desk?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Would counsel consent to be interrupted for the propounding of a question?

Mr. LINFORTH. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The interrogatory will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Now, note the interrogatory, gentlemen of the Senate:

Q. In view of your last answer, please answer this question "yes" or "no." Did you not tell the judge you would not employ any of the lawyers present, including a member of the McAuliffe firm? Then did you not, after having consulted Ackerman and receiving his acceptance, go and employ McAuliffe, a member of whose firm was present when you agreed to exclude attorneys present from consideration?

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. President, I suggest that the question should be divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is for the witness to determine. If it is not intelligible to him and he desires to have it divided, it may be done.

The WITNESS. I would appreciate that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the first part of the question.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"In view of your last answer, please answer this question 'yes' or 'no.' Did you not tell the judge you would not employ any of the lawyers present, including a member of the McAuliffe firm?"

A. Yes.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"Then did you not, after having consulted Ackerman and receiving his acceptance, go and employ McAuliffe, a member of whose firm was present when you agreed to exclude attorneys present from consideration?"

A. I was engaging Mr. McAuliffe and not his firm.

I digress for a moment to say what a miserable subterfuge this answer was—"I was employing Mr. McAuliffe and not his firm." Who were the attorneys for the stock exchange? Not Mr. McAuliffe individually, but the firm of which he was a member; but the answer, even as given, shifty as it was—and I use that expression with great respect and not intending any reflection on Mr. Strong—even as it was, it was not true and it was not correct.

What happened the next morning?

At 9 o'clock or thereabouts Mr. White, a member of this firm of attorneys for the stock exchange, appeared in the chambers of the judge. What was he there for? He then and there told the judge he had with him a petition signed by Mr. Strong for the employment, not of Mr. McAuliffe but for the employment of this firm. Mr. White, under my cross-examination, admitted the petition was for the employment of the firm and not of Mr. McAuliffe individually. May I invite your attention briefly to that testimony? I am referring to page 237 of the record:

Q. Did you tell the judge on your first visit, the day after the appointment of the receiver, that you had with you a petition for the appointment of the firm of Heller, Ehrmann, White & McAuliffe as attorneys for the receiver, Strong?—A. I did.

Q. You told him that petition was for the appointment of the firm?—A. Yes; it was.

Q. And it was for the appointment of the firm, was it not?—A. It was.

There can be no doubt, I maintain, that the judge acted in the utmost good faith. I have no doubt that Mr. Strong himself wanted to act in the utmost good faith, but he was under the power, under the control, and under the dominion of the stock exchange.

No doubt Mr. Strong intended to play fair and honest with the judge. No doubt he intended to keep his promise to the judge, but the pressure was too great. They had already succeeded in getting from the judge the appointment of their own man as receiver; and the judge, as a wise judge, and made cautious by the double filing, would not stand for the appointment of the attorneys for the stock exchange as the attorneys for the receiver. His homely expression was that it looked to him as if it were "too much of the same family", and that is the reason which he gave them at this time. The testimony, which I shall not take the time to read, will be found at pages 683 and 684 of the record.

"Too much of the same family!" Remember, at that time we had had the crash in the stock market. Stock transactions and stockbrokers at that point were not looked upon with favor. The judge, as a sensible man, knew and had a right to believe that the public would be involved to a greater or less extent in the failure of the Russell-Colvin firm, and as a cautious judge said to them, "While I give you the receivership, I want a check on it. I want to look after the attorneyship. I do not want too much of the same family in the matter."

What did he do? He talked with Mr. Strong on several occasions. Mr. Strong would agree to no one but the attorneys for the stock exchange. The judge suggested to Mr. Strong reputable, leading lawyers of San Francisco. True, he admitted when he made these suggestions he knew Mr. Strong would not accept them, that he was wedded to the stock-exchange attorneys, but he wanted to get his attitude. He wanted proof of his conduct before he removed him. He suggested such well-known firms as Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro; Sullivan, Sullivan & Roche, the firm of which your senior Senator is now a partner; Cushing & Cushing; and others, but Mr. Strong would have no one except the stock-exchange lawyers, Heller, Ehrmann, White & McAuliffe.

Some of the members of this court have been judges in trial courts. Under these conditions, put yourselves in the position of respondent at that time. What would you do with a receiver who was defying you? What would you do with a receiver who told you he would not obey your orders, who would not counsel with you, who would not follow any suggestion you made if it did not agree with the advice received by him from the attorneys for the stock exchange? Would you not remove him? Is there a judge within these United States that has enough backbone to be a judge that would not have removed him?

Now, how did the judge act? One hundred percent a gentleman. He had appointed Mr. Strong at the solicitation of certain reputable attorneys, Mr. Marrin's firm and Mr. Brown's firm. What did the judge do? He sent for those gentlemen and told them as a matter of courtesy what had happened. He said to them he was satisfied, unless Mr. Strong changed his attitude, that he would be compelled to remove him and if he did he was thinking of appointing a Mr. Hunter. He told them his information about Mr. Hunter. He did not stop there. He went farther and said, "Will you please investigate Mr. Hunter and let me hear from you by 4 o'clock if you have any objection to him?" Not having heard from them, they not having shown him the courtesy of communicating with him, he telephoned them and asked what report, if any, they had to make as to Mr. Hunter. The reply was, "While we will not agree to him, from everything we hear he is a competent man." The respondent then appointed Mr. Hunter. Was he a competent man? Members of this court have seen him on the stand and have heard the results of his administration. Was the judgment of the respondent in selecting Mr. Hunter as receiver borne out by what has happened?

The respondent is charged with allowing, "willfully, deliberately and improperly, excessive attorneys' fees" in that case. He is charged with appointing a young man as attorney. May I tell a story about myself on the question of being young? Many years ago I was a partner of the father of the present senior Senator from California [Mr. Johnson]. I was quite young in those days. The father of the present senior Senator from California was then a Congressman. In the discharge of his duties as such it was necessary for him to leave California for Washington when an important case in the office came up for trial. The client was sent for. I was introduced to him as the candidate for the trial of that case. My partner, the venerable Mr. Johnson, afterward said to me, "No luck, Walter; you are guilty of the unpardonable sin of being young."

I maintain in this case, the most that can be urged against Mr. Short is that he was a young man; but, young or old, we all recognize ability and we all are willing to give credit to those who are entitled to credit, whether young or old. Who did this work for the receiver in this case? I care not whether it was Mr. Short or whether it was the older and more experienced Mr. Erskine, or whether it was both of them. What was the result?

When we had the head of the stock-exchange attorneys upon the witness stand, Mr. Ehrmann, do you recall his testimony? He was a witness upon the hearing for fees. You remember what he said? In substance, his testimony was, "the work of the receiver, the work of his attorneys, was excellent." So I say give the young man his due. The work done, out of the mouth of the opposition—the head of the opposition—was declared to be excellent. Let me read just a word in that connection.

RECESS

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I rise to inquire of the honorable managers on the part of the House and the honorable attorneys on the part of the respondent if they will object to a request that I desire to make for a recess of 40 minutes? I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any suggestion on the part of counsel for the respondent or the managers on the part of the House? Is there objection to taking a recess for 40 minutes?

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. We shall be very glad to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection (at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p.m.), the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, took a recess for 40 minutes. At the conclusion of the recess the Senate, sitting as a court, reassembled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair appoints to preside for the remainder of the day the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

(Mr. GEORGE thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer for the remainder of the day.)

CONTINUATION OF ARGUMENT ON BEHALF OF RESPONDENT BY WALTER H. LINFORTH, ESQ.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are counsel for the respondent ready to proceed?

Mr. LINFORTH. Yes; Mr. President, may I proceed?

Gentlemen of the Senate, just as we took the recess, I was referring to the fact that no matter who rendered the service in the Russell-Colvin case, whether it was the elder Mr. Erskine or the young Mr. Short, we have the testimony from the main opposition, the head of the firm of attorneys representing the stock exchange, as to the character of those services. May I read you just a word from the record, found at page 357, as to the opinion of the head of the firm of attorneys representing the stock exchange as to the character of those services? [Reading from page 357:]

Q. Did you so testify before Judge Louderback on that hearing and before he made any order?—A. I did.

Q. And was that your then opinion?—A. Based on the evidence that I heard, that was my opinion, and still is, on all the evidence that I heard given in that case.

Q. And was it your opinion at that time that the work done, both by the receiver and by his attorneys, had been excellent from every source that you had heard from?—A. From any source I had heard from, the administration had been very well carried on, excellently carried on.

Q. Both by the receiver and by his attorneys?—A. As far as I had heard.

So I submit, gentlemen of this court, in the light of that testimony, it lies in the mouth of no one to question the character of the services rendered by the receiver and by the attorneys in that matter.

So far as the amount of fees allowed is concerned, we have the testimony that was introduced before the court on the hearing of the application and we have such men as John McNabb, Albert Rosenshine, and Henry Jacobs, placing the value of the services as from $55,000 to $75,000. We have the agreement entered into by all of the parties in open court to the effect that $46,250 should be allowed.

In this connection let me call attention to the testimony of the bookkeeper of Russell-Colvin & Co. to the effect that the securities of the firm and of the customers were of the appraised value, at the time of the receivership, of $3,060,000. That will be found at page 391 of the record. The receiver actually received and handled a sum in excess of $1,000,000 in firm assets, as shown at page 391 of the record. We have the uncontradicted testimony of the receiver that from the frozen assets of this concern, which had no market value at all, he realized from the Consolidated Box Co. assets $130,000 plus; from the Coen Co. and its frozen assets, $25,500; and from the Anchorage Light & Power Co. and its frozen assets, $63,000. The record of the receivership, in a very few words, shows the secured creditors received 100 cents on the dollar; the marginal creditors received 55 cents on the dollar; the general creditors 28 cents on the dollar; and there is enough remaining to pay them 12 cents more, thus making for the general creditors 40 cents on the dollar.

Just a word further on the question of the value of the services of the attorneys and I am through, so far as that branch of the case is concerned. No question arises in the practice of the law which is more difficult to determine and on which there is a greater range of opinion than the question of the value of services. Many members of the Court of Impeachment are lawyers. Many of them have been judges. No two will agree on the value that should be given to services rendered in any particular case. The matter is largely one of discretion. There is no proof here to justify the charge that the respondent in this case "willfully and oppressively" allowed any exorbitant or excessive fee.

We then come to the next charge in the impeachment articles and that is that respondent entered into a conspiracy with Mr. Leake in regard to the question of his residence in Contra Costa County. I have read into the record section 52 of the political code of the State of California. In our State, as in nearly all the States, the question of domicile or residence is a question of joint act and intent. In this matter the record is all one way.

The judge had a home, he had a residence, and that home and that residence was at 666 Post Street in San Francisco. Owing to unfortunate family differences, he gave up that home and temporarily went to the Fairmont Hotel in San Francisco, occupying a room in the bachelor quarters for which he paid the sum of $75 per month. When he went there to occupy that room the thought was in his mind that perhaps the family differences might be adjusted and a reconciliation might occur. At the end of about 6 months, that hope not being realized, what happened?

The judge determined upon having a legal residence, a legal domicile. He had given up his home where he resided with his wife. He was temporarily living at the Fairmont Hotel. Then after 6 months, after concluding that his hope of reconciliation was a thing of the past, he turned to the home of his brother where he had formerly lived and with whom he had formerly made his home. On the 6th of April 1930 he determined to establish his bona fide domicile in the home of his brother across the Alameda County line, a distance of 40 minutes' travel from San Francisco.

The brother and his wife were willing, and the respondent was given a room in that home and a key to the house. He moved his belongings to that home, endeavored there to live. He canceled his registration in San Francisco and registered as a voter in Contra Costa County. He made the attempt, referred to in the evidence, to occupy and reside in that home; but due to an early affliction from which he had suffered, viz, asthma, was unable to live there. Whether it was due to the plants around the place and in the house, whether it was the flowers, or whether it was the pet cat, the attacks of asthma were recurring, and he was compelled to leave, and thereafter slept in the room in the Fairmont Hotel. Residence is a question of act and intent. Having abandoned his residence at the home where he resided with his wife, he had a right in law to establish a domicile; and he established that legal residence in the county of Contra Costa, at the home of his brother, and he has voted at that place continuously from that time to this.

This brings me to the question of his relation with Mr. W. S. Leake. He had known Mr. Leake from 1908. His father before him knew Mr. Leake. Mr. Leake had been an outstanding character in the life of San Francisco. He had been a man devoting more or less of his time to politics. He had been the postmaster of the city of Sacramento. He had been the editor of one of the leading newspapers in San Francisco known as the "Call", now known as the "Call-Bulletin." Through visiting the Fairmont Hotel, where the aunt of the respondent resided, in 1918, he became personally acquainted with Mr. Leake. From then on down to the time he ran for the office of superior judge of the State of California on the second occasion in 1926, his relations with Mr. Leake were purely casual. In 1926 Mr. Leake was very helpful to him in making suggestions which aided him in his candidacy for that office.

Upon his election and upon his appointment as judge of that court, being assigned to the office of presiding judge, in 6 or 7 instances, he appointed Mr. Leake receiver in what we term "small unlawful-detainer cases." In those 6 or 7 cases, either by allowances from the respondent or other judges, Mr. Leake received a total of not more than $1,000. He received an appointment as appraiser in a petty matter in which he received a fee of $5, and also an appointment as appraiser in the matter of the Brickell estate, in which he received a fee of $500. Down to that point these are the full relations between the respondent and the witness Leake.

After his appointment as judge of the Federal court, no other appointments of any kind were made to Mr. Leake by the respondent. His associations with him from that time on were merely those of friendship; and the meetings were only those at the Fairmont Hotel, where both lived following the time the judge occupied room 26.

The circumstances surrounding the occupation of that room are fully disclosed by the record and contradicted by no one. Let me recount that situation briefly.

In September 1929 the judge unfortunately had met the parting of the ways with his wife. The separation took place that month. The judge, with grip in hand, went to the Fairmont Hotel for accommodations and quarters. It is natural that he should have gone to that place. His aunt, the sister of his mother, resided there, and had resided there for years.

In the lobby he met his friend Mr. Leake. If you knew the situation of the Fairmont Hotel you would understand it. I have lived there myself. It is a family hotel. In the evening there is a gathering of guests in the lobby, and that gathering takes place every evening. The gathering is such that each guest has his own chair, and each guest nightly occupies the same.

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. Mr. President, I do not desire to interrupt counsel, but I give notice that if this is going to be the line of argument we shall endeavor to some degree to avail ourselves of it. We say that counsel is testifying at this time. I do not desire to object. I merely desire to serve notice now that we are going to avail ourselves of that line of argument.

Mr. LINFORTH. May I add that what I have said is the record, with the exception of the statement of my own residence there. I ask that what I have said in that respect be disregarded.

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. If it will not interrupt counsel, I desire to make it clear that I have no objection to the character of argument. We simply want, when we come to our argument, to avail ourselves of the same privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Counsel will confine themselves to the record.

Mr. LINFORTH. Mr. President, I apologize for my reference to my own staying at the Fairmont Hotel and ask the Senators to disregard that. Whatever else I have said in that respect is within the record.

When Judge Louderback separated from his wife and took temporary shelter in the Fairmont Hotel in September he met his friend Mr. Leake in the lobby. What took place is the most natural thing to have occurred. The judge shrank from newspaper publicity. He hoped the separation from his wife was not permanent. He did not desire newspaper notoriety on that subject. He appealed to his friend Mr. Leake to ascertain if it was possible for him to have accommodations at the hotel without registering, so that the papers would not know that he was separated from his wife and occupying a room there alone.

Mr. Leake, who on account of the illness of his wife, had a room where he could rest—kindly and promptly suggested, "You may have my room if it is agreeable to the management of the hotel." Immediately the matter was taken up with the management of the hotel. It was agreeable to them. The respondent thereupon started to occupy the room theretofore occupied by Mr. Leake; and monthly, according to the testimony and the checks offered in evidence, paid every charge that was made against that room during his entire stay at that hotel.

The charge contained in the indictment that the respondent and Mr. Leake entered into a conspiracy for the purpose of providing a false registration in Contra Costa County to the respondent, falls to the ground without an iota of proof in support of it.

We are then met with the suggestion that contributions have been made to Mr. Leake. What is the full extent of the record on that subject?

Mr. Leake, a man of advanced years, for 20 years or more practicing the calling of Christian Science, has been living at the Fairmont Hotel. According to his testimony, he makes no charges. He treats in his way and to the best of his ability everyone, rich or poor, who may come to him. No fees are exacted, no charges are made, but they are at liberty to make contributions, if they so see fit.

At this point I desire to apologize for being the cause of bringing that aged man across the continent in order to be a witness here. When the managers investigating this matter were in California in September of last year, the deposition or testimony of Mr. Leake was taken.

It was not completed; and counsel then representing the respondent reserved his right to cross-examine upon the completion of the direct examination. The witness was never recalled. The direct examination was never completed. No opportunity, therefore, was afforded the respondent to cross-examine. Not until February of this year were these charges made; and then, for the first time, 5 months after the testimony of Mr. Leake had been taken, the charge of conspiracy with Mr. Leake was made.

When the learned managers for the House were in the State of California, shortly before the hearing of these proceedings, in person I requested of them permission to take by deposition the testimony of Mr. Leake. I even went so far as to agree to consider the testimony he has already given as part of his testimony, with permission to supplement it on the matters that had not been testified to at the former hearing—

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. Mr. President, I should like to know if counsel claims that that is in the record.

Mr. LINFORTH. It is a matter of stipulation, Mr. President.

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. Do you mean that that is in the record?

Mr. LINFORTH. Well, you do not deny it; do you, gentlemen?

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. No; but I just want to serve notice that we are going to make the same kind of argument. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Counsel will not engage in controversy. Counsel will confine himself to matters in the record.

Mr. LINFORTH. I shall be glad to do that, Mr. President.

Without proceeding much further, Senators, I think it is proper for me to say that we did not get the testimony of Mr. Leake when the managers were in California. Therefore we had a subpoena served on him to appear here; and when the telegram came to the honorable managers—not to us—from the attending physician that Mr. Leake's health was such that he could safely come if furnished with a nurse, we then, with the responsibility resting upon us of protecting and defending to the best of our ability the honor of the respondent, asked the Presiding Officer to bring him on here, and he came.

What does the record show in regard to contributions made to him by everybody connected with this case?

Mr. Gilbert, the receiver appointed in some matters, has testified that for years his wife was a patient of Mr. Leake, and at times he, Mr. Gilbert, was also a patient; that the wife of Mr. Gilbert at times made donations of $5 to Mr. Leake, and that on one occasion Mr. Gilbert had made a donation of $150 for services that Mr. Leake had rendered to his wife.

What is the testimony of Mr. Hunter, the receiver appointed in the Russell-Colvin case, who was allowed the largest fee in any of the matters under consideration on this subject? His testimony is that he never was a patient of Mr. Leake, and that he never at any time made any contribution to him. He further testified that when Mr. LaGuardia and the others were in San Francisco they not only examined his bank account, his bank book, his checks, but they even had him open his wife's safe-deposit box, which they went through; and we are supposed to be living in the United States, in a free country! After an exhibition of that kind, opposing counsel this morning try to have you infer that Mr. Leake must have received some of the moneys referred to in the account with the Fairmont Hotel, from Mr. Hunter!

If there ever was a gentleman, it is the receiver, Mr. Hunter—efficient, competent, and courteous.

Who next? Mr. Short and Mr. Erskine, the attorneys in the Russell-Colvin matter.

Mr. Erskine says he did not even know Mr. Leake. Mr. Short says that through visiting his father-in-law and his mother-in-law, who lived at the Fairmont Hotel, he had met Mr. Leake, but his acquaintanceship with him was purely casual.

Who else? Mr. Dinkelspiel, as to whom they try to draw some inference or some connection between the date of his fees and some of the amounts credited to Mr. Leake's account in the Fairmont Hotel records. What does Mr. Dinkelspiel say? Why, he tells you, "I do not know Mr. Leake, and I never saw him." And Mr. Leake, from his chair at the point where I am now standing, at his advanced age in life, prepared and ready at any time to meet his Maker, under oath, tells you that he did not know, and had never met, either one of the Dinkelspiels.

Who else? Mr. Woodworth. He tells you that he never was a patient of Mr. Leake, and he never made a contribution of a single cent to him.

Who else? The son of the ex-Senator whom I love—my chum and my pal for nearly 50 years—the Honorable Samuel M. Shortridge. What does he say? Why, they drag from him the fact that his mother has been a semi-invalid for over 25 years; that she has been suffering from a nervous breakdown; that for more than 12 years she has been a patient of Mr. Leake's. Mr. Samuel M. Shortridge, Jr., like a son I would be proud to have, when he had any money, in consideration for what Mr. Leake had done for his mother and on account of the service he had rendered her, paid to him in different amounts, at different times, as much as $1,000.

I have gone through the record from beginning to end. I challenge the learned gentlemen representing the managers to point to anything on that subject that I have omitted.

The respondent never was a patient of Mr. Leake. Whether you agree with Christian Science or not, is not the question. Some of us believe it is helpful, others may not. Whether it is or whether it is not, is not the question before you, but the question is whether or not this respondent, or anyone connected with him has been corrupt, so far as Mr. Leake is concerned.

Are you going to decide this case, are you going to bend the head of this respondent in shame upon speculation, upon suspicion, upon conjecture or surmise, or are you going to say, "We are sitting here as judges, and upon our oaths we are going to demand the proof, and if they cannot furnish the proof, we are going to give him the benefit of what the law says he is entitled to, namely, the presumption of innocence."

What else is there, so far as Mr. Leake's connection with this case is concerned? The respondent was asked and he stated frankly that at times he had made loans to Mr. Leake in small sums, the largest being $350. My reference is to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday, pages 3971-3973. Why should he not? Here was a friend—one who had been good to him, one who had given him the benefit of his political knowledge at the time he was a candidate for office, one to whom he felt he could go for advice, a friend of his father's, a friend of his since 1918; when that friend was in distress, why should he not make him a loan of $50, or whatever it was? He tells you that whatever he loaned him in these small amounts Mr. Leake always repaid.

You have the full picture, so far as the relations of the respondent with Mr. Leake are concerned, and from the record—not from the statements of the opposition, but from the record as made here—you have the full relations of every person interested in any receivership, either as receiver or as counsel, with Mr. Leake.

You have, in addition to that, the statement of that venerable old man, with his hand raised to God that he would tell the truth, denying that he ever received a single cent from any one of them, and you have the testimony of the respondent that at no time, that at no place, that under no conditions, did he ever profit to the extent of a single cent by any transaction involved in this hearing.

As against that, what have you? You have not the testimony of a single, solitary witness. You are told that Mr. Leake in 6 years, according to these reports, put in the Fairmont Hotel $29,000 to his credit. What of it? Figure it out. It is less than $500 a month, and he tells you, according to the testimony they took in San Francisco, that his donations from his practice were at least $200, and some months more, and he tells you here, from his chair of pain, that when his wife died he had no further use for his life-insurance policy, and that he canceled it and received therefrom $3,900. He tells you, in addition to that, the moneys in that account came from that life insurance, from loans from his friends, from donations from his patients, and from sales of his books.

You have it in mind, from the testimony which they took in San Francisco and which has been read here, that he has written books. He offered a set of those books to Mr. LaGuardia, who, in his way, suggested, "Give them to the judge instead." But you have before you the fact that he is an author on the subject of his practice, or his thoughts, or whatever you want to term it, in which he has been dealing for twenty-odd years. My memory may not be clear, but I think the record shows that those books have been translated in various languages. He tells you here, from this chair, that in addition to the sources of income to which I have referred, he also had the income from the sale of those books.

With that kind of a record, with not even as much as a suspicion against him, who is going to say that the respondent entered into any conspiracy with that venerable old man, and are you going to mark the respondent with the brand of shame on account of his associations or relations with that old gentleman?

Something was said this morning about Mr. Leake hiring a detective, that that was suspicious. I have just spoken of suspicion. You are not going to convict respondent on suspicion, but you should not have the slightest suspicion on the subject, if you follow the record. What is that record? The judge and his wife were separated, through unhappy differences, and the managers asked Mr. Leake, "Did you not hire a detective to shadow Mrs. Louderback?" That is on page 642, but I have not time to read it. That venerable old gentleman is not that kind of a man, and his answer was, "I did not."

"Did you not hire a detective?"

"Yes; I hired a detective."

"What did you hire a detective for?"

"I had a report that someone was shadowing the judge, and, without his knowledge, I had a detective verify whether that was so, and I paid for that out of my own pocket."

You will find that also, Senators, at page 642.

Family differences, the wife and husband separated, not knowing what the wife contemplated, not knowing what the wife might be doing, the good friend, hearing that the judge was being followed, wanted to find out whether it was so or not, and whether the wife was doing it.

Is there anything to condemn him for in so doing? If he were your friend, under like conditions, if he did a thing of that sort for you without your knowledge, and at his own expense, would you criticize him for it? Would you impeach this respondent for a thing of that kind? If you permit me to say it without any disrespect, I say it is sheer nonsense.

I have completed everything I desire to say with reference to each and every matter referred to in article I of the articles of impeachment, and the rest of the matters I shall very briefly refer to, because I take it, if the first article of impeachment, which is the main charge, falls to the ground, as my associate said, of its own weight, little time need be spent on the rest.

The second matter referred to in the articles of impeachment is the Lumbermen's Reciprocal case, so called. You heard my opponent, Mr. Manager BROWNING, this morning say something about a peculiar habit out West of three names on a list as possible receivers being handed Mr. Slavin. You heard the testimony of Mr. Reisner, who represented the plaintiff in that case, that there never was any such list, that he never saw any such list, and that he never heard of any such list. He told you, further, that Samuel M. Shortridge, Jr., was appointed receiver in that case at the suggestion of Attorney Slavin. The judge was so careful in that instance that he had both attorneys put their request in writing for the appointment of Mr. Shortridge, and that request has been offered in evidence.

Opposing counsel also said to you that the respondent, when he knew the claim of Helen Lay, upon which that action was founded, was disallowed, insisted on maintaining jurisdiction of that case. That statement is not correct. It is not in accord with the record. The record shows, not that the claim of Helen Lay was disallowed but that a rehearing merely had been granted. In other words, that tribunal had not rejected the claim of Helen Lay but had granted a petition for the purpose of rehearing and reconsideration.

The attention of the Senate was also called to the proviso clause contained in the order of December 15, 1931, relating to the surrender of the property to the State insurance commissioner. Senators, have in mind the testimony of Marshall Woodworth, to the effect that that thought originated with him, not with the respondent, and that when he drew that order he thought it proper to provide for a bond before the receiver turned over the assets of some forty-odd thousand dollars; that he had taken to the State insurance commissioner, Mr. Woodworth further testified, the draft order to Mr. Guereña, the attorney for the other side, and submitted it to him for his approval before it was taken to the judge; and the only disagreement between the two was not over the proviso clause but over the amount of the bond that should be given.

Did Marshall Woodworth tell the truth? Mr. Guereña was here, having been subpoenaed as a witness by the other side, but was not called. So we have a right to assume from the fact that they did not call him and that he did not deny what Marshall Woodworth said, that the conversation related by Mr. Woodworth took place. When the order was submitted to the respondent he immediately objected to that clause. Such is the testimony of the respondent and such is the testimony of Mr. Woodworth. Nobody says anything to the contrary.

When the order was presented to his respondent what happened? He immediately said, "I do not like that clause"; but Mr. Woodworth explained to him what he meant by it; he told him that they were negotiating on the amount of the bond and the order contained a clause that it was only until the further order of the court. Accordingly respondent signed the order.

Then what happened? Within a few days—not more than 2 weeks—upon further and more mature consideration, the respondent became absolutely convinced that he had erred in including that proviso clause in the order. He is a man big enough to admit when he makes a mistake, and he sent for the counsel and said, "That order is wrong; I would correct it myself immediately, but they having taken an appeal, I doubt my power; you arrange it by stipulation and immediately get a stipulation setting aside that clause in the order." The stipulation was obtained, and the order immediately modified and set aside, and this before any record had been prepared on appeal in that case. This is the end of the second article of impeachment.

Now what is the third? The third relates to the Fageol case and to the appointment of Mr. Gilbert, who, they claim and say, was and is an incompetent man to be appointed receiver.

Let us see for a minute whether or not it is proper to say that Mr. Gilbert was an incompetent man to be appointed receiver. He had been for 35 long years in one position. As a boy, at 16, he became an employee of the Western Union Telegraph Co., and he has the record of working with that company for 35 years. For 10 years of that time he had been the night traffic manager, in charge of the entire operating department, with approximately 150 employees under him.

As to what he did, as to his capacity, as to his ability, I am going to read you the testimony of the division superintendent and traffic man of the Western Union Telegraph Co., who appeared here as a witness. I read from his testimony at page 666:

Q. During the last 10 years of his service there what was his official position?—A. He was night traffic manager.

Q. And as night traffic manager, what were his hours?—A. From 4 p.m. until midnight.

Q. And what were his duties?—A. Well, he had charge of the entire operating department—general supervisor, you might say. He had entire charge of all of the different departments in the operating room.

Q. In that capacity did he have any employees under him?—A. Yes, he did.

Q. How many?—A. Approximately 150; sometimes a little less and sometimes more.

What kind of man is the best fitted for a receivership? Is it the man who will go into a going business and say to those in charge, "Tell me what your plans are and tell what your thoughts are and, if I approve of them, I will work with you"? Or, is the best kind of a receiver the man who turns them all out and undertakes to run the business without knowing a thing about it? James A. Wainwright, the head of the Oakland bank, the largest creditor of the company, writes this kind of a letter about Mr. Gilbert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will counsel for the respondent permit the Chair to suggest that he has 10 minutes remaining?

Mr. LINFORTH. I thank the Chair. The letter to which I refer is dated July 28, 1932—I am reading from page 256 of the record:

(U.S.S. Exhibit No. 23)

JULY 28, 1932.

G. H. GILBERT, Esq.,

Pageol Motors Co., Oakland, Calif.

DEAR SIR: It is my pleasure at this time to acknowledge my appreciation for the cooperation extended me as a representative of this bank, in the matter of the Pageol receivership.

You at all times were willing and did listen to and heed the advice and counsel of the writer and other representatives of the large creditors.

I wish you success in any future undertaking and trust that though your connection with the Pageol Co. is at an end, I may have the pleasure of seeing you in the future whenever you have occasion to be in Oakland.

With my kindest well wishes, I am yours sincerely,

JAS. A. WAINWRIGHT.

Could anybody ask for a better recommendation of a receiver than that of the vice president of that bank in Oakland?

The Prudential case is next. I can only briefly refer to it. Mr. Stephens appeared before the judge with the attorney at the time the application for the receiver was made. He announced he was its vice president. That was the only information the respondent had on the subject. He believed his statement, and, believing his statement, he made the order.

The manager on the part of the House said that Judge St. Sure, in dismissing the matter, made the remark there was a bad smell about the case, but the honorable manager told just a half-truth. He did not refer to the letter in evidence from Judge St. Sure to the effect that when he made that remark he had no reference whatever to Judge Louderback.

This concern, instead of being a $2,000,000 concern, was a "fly-by-night", if I may be permitted to use that slang expression. It had its headquarters and its offices in Oakland, and the only bank account it had was in the big little city of Reno, Nev., where it had two or three hundred dollars; and Mr. Hawkins, its counsel, told Mr. Dinkelspiel its whole assets would not amount to $250. That is at page 606 of the record, Senators. Mr. Hawkins was here and did not take the stand and did not deny this testimony.

The Golden State Asparagus Co. case is next, and the Sonora receivership matter. It will be recalled that in the Sonora receivership matter a fee of $20,000 was allowed, where the receiver had collected over $300,000 and where the parties had agreed to $17,500 as the amount to be allowed the attorneys. The court, however, allowed $20,000. It will be recalled that Mr. Edwards, as receiver, appointed through the American Can Co., testified that when the court gave him the name of Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel to act as attorneys, he went to his own attorneys, Chickering & Gregory, and asked them about those attorneys, the respondent having told him if the attorneys whose names he had given did not suit to come back and he would suggest another name. Chickering & Gregory said, "You cannot get finer men in that line of business", and under those conditions he employed Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel. That will be found at page 670. I have not time to read it.

A reference to the Brickell estate appraisement, and then I am through. That was a trifling matter. The estate was appraised at over a million and odd dollars. The three appraisers were allowed $1,750. We all know—those who have been practicing and those who have been on the bench—that usually one appraiser does the work. When this matter came before the respondent it only came before him on the settlement of the final account, and the trustee, the First Federal Trust Co., the bank which had filed the account in which the amounts allowed were set forth, testified that the account was true and correct in every respect, and having no other information the court settled it.

Every receiver appointed was a decent man. Every lawyer appointed was a competent lawyer. Every receivership was ably managed and conducted.

I close as I opened by saying it is my honest conclusion that the learned managers of the House have been misled by certain attorneys in this case. I am grateful that the case is rapidly reaching its close. I know it has been a trying task to you gentlemen to give the time that you have given to this matter with the various emergency matters pending before you.

I had occasion about 5 weeks ago to visit Mount Vernon, and there at the tomb of the immortal Washington I saw the respondent, hat in hand, head bowed, lips in prayer, paying his tribute to that great chief, because he also was a soldier. From that moment, after witnessing that event, every ounce of vitality within me has been dedicated to the cause of the respondent. Are you going to return him to his home with a brand of disapproval upon his brow? Are you going to bow his head in shame simply because in the discharge of his duty he would not yield to a firm of powerful attorneys who wanted to control a receivership? Please tell me by your verdict that such a thing cannot be done.

CALL OF THE ROLL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The managers on the part of the House may proceed with the concluding argument.

CONCLUDING ARGUMENT ON BEHALF OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
BY MR. MANAGER SUMNERS

Mr. Manager SUMNERS. Gentlemen of the court, I appear here, insofar as my own attitude in this matter is concerned, not as a prosecuting officer but as a counselor and an adviser of the Senate in connection with one of the highest duties that the two branches of the Congress can be called upon to perform. It is the duty of the House in the first instance, as is well known, to act as an inquisitorial body; and, second, to appear at the bar of the Senate having the responsibility, insofar as that appearance is concerned with reference to the judiciary of trying to preserve for this country a decent judiciary. The House has performed its part of that responsibility, except the concluding remarks which I am about to make, and from this time on the responsibility shall rest with the Senate.

I believe I may state as a matter of common knowledge that perhaps at no time in the country's history has the institution of the Federal judiciary been at a lower ebb than it is at this moment. At no time in the history of the Federal judiciary has it been more essential to have on the Federal bench men in whom the people of the country shall have implicit confidence.

With regard to the kind of a proceeding this is, referring to the discussion of counsel for the respondent, insofar as I can understand the duty of the Senate as they relate themselves to our scheme of government, it is to protect the Federal judiciary and to protect the people against those persons connected with the judiciary whose conduct arouses doubt as to their honesty. It may never be held in a free government that persons appointed during good behavior may hold office over a free people until they shall be convicted of a crime and brought before the Senate as a felon in chains. I shall never assume that responsibility before a decent, self-respecting Senate imposed by such a standard. I lay down this proposition and this standard: From an examination of the whole history of impeachment and particularly as it relates itself to our system of government, when the facts proven with reference to a respondent are such as are reasonably calculated to arouse a substantial doubt in the minds of the people over whom that respondent exercises authority, that he is not brave, candid, honest, and true, there is no other alternative than to remove such a judge from the bench, because wherever doubt resides confidence cannot be present. It is not in the nature of free government that the people must submit to the government of a man as to whom they have substantial doubt.

We do not accept that as the minimum of responsibility in this case, however. I hope in the time I have to discuss the facts in the case, only 50 minutes, that I may be excused for not following the details of the record.

My distinguished friend, attorney for the respondent, trained as is evidenced by his presentation to the Senate in the defense, in his closing remarks, notwithstanding objections quite frequently made to his testifying, tells the Senate that the respondent went down to Mount Vernon, and this astute counsel stood off to one side and watched the respondent shed tears and make a prayer at the shrine of George Washington. That is his closing statement. He is trying this case, though, before a jury of another type, trying this case before a jury of Senators who soon will sit in the final determination of this issue, and who will sit as strong men conscious of a great responsibility.

Of course, we do not want the respondent ousted if the facts do not justify the ouster; neither do we want a constituency of free men, who have resorted here to the only tribunal we have in this country for their relief, the Senate of the United States, to be unjustly dealt with; we do not want the Senate of the United States to force an officer upon an unwilling free people through the remainder of his life, a judge against whom such charges as have been brought as are embodied in the articles of impeachment, and which we have proven.

I grant that it is the first responsibility to protect the judge—to protect the judge against powerful influences.

My distinguished friend for the respondent mitigates as far as he can the situation of the managers by saying that we have been imposed upon. I tell you we have not been imposed upon. We went into the community where free men live in San Francisco and from their lips heard the tales of an imposition unreasonable and intolerable among a free people. If I may say so without boasting, I do not believe there ever walked the face of the earth a group of lawyers who could carry out a design to impose upon me and my associates to a successful conclusion. It did not happen.

This record discloses that a man holds office in a community, a man of whom the people are ashamed and whose authority they resent. Why do they resent it? Look at this case from the standpoint of decent, self-respecting people, proud sons of pioneers, living out there in the West. You come into town and you say, "Where does your Federal judge live?" Now, just follow me a little bit. These are things that affect the whole situation. "Where does your Federal judge live?" Well, we find somebody who says, "We don't know; we don't know." If I wanted to talk outside of the record I could tell you some things about how difficult it was to find where this judge lived; and when we finally found where he lived, he was living under the cover of Sam Leake!

Think of a proud people thus situated! Think of any decent, self-respecting man living for 3 years in an American hotel registered under the name of another man!

That was not all. When he went on the stand, he swore that he lived at a place for those 3 years and had not slept in the room of his residence more than 3 or 4 times, once a year. I am talking about the respect of the people for the man who holds office among them. What would you think about a Federal judge of yours slipping in and slipping out of a hotel, and claiming that he was living at a place where he had not slept more than 3 or 4 times in as many years?

He claims there were some flowers there; but the main thing seems to be that they had a cat in his brother's home and he and the cat could not live at the same place, so evidently it was decided that the cat should stay and the judge should go. [Laughter.] That is the God Almighty's truth. That is the sworn testimony in this case. Do you not understand and can you not understand why the blood of a self-respecting people boiled when they have to face a situation like that?

Do brave, courageous, open and aboveboard men live that way? I ask each Senator here did you ever know, since the day of your birth, a brave, courageous, self-respecting man to live in that way? Did you ever know any man to live that way who was not slick, slipping in, sliding about?

Then, you can begin to see this case over in San Francisco; and when he goes on the stand he swears that he lives in Contra Costa County—a judge of the Federal court holding up his hand to God Almighty and swearing upon his oath that he is living at a place where he has not slept more than once a year, and the only other supporting evidence is that he has a trunk over there, maybe, and mainly that he has a Tuxedo coat. I am talking about the sworn testimony in this case.

Who is this man Sam Leake? Do you know this Sam Leake? I do not say he was faking; but I do say that it is possible that Sam Leake, appearing here on a cot in that condition, was somewhat like the judge praying down at Mount Vernon so that his lawyer could come here and stand on the floor of the Senate and try to wring the tears of sympathy from mature Senators. It is the same class of stuff. I do not know whether it just happened accidentally or not.

I formed some opinion of the opinion out in that country, some opinion of the bar. You can hardly get a lawyer—I say this as a matter of common knowledge—who will raise his voice against a Federal judge. I make that statement after 20 years of observation and contact with people. You can hardly get them to do it, and you know it. Every mother's son of you knows it. If you see a bar association demanding an investigation of a Federal judge, there may be some among them who want a controlled judge; but you never in your life saw the bar of a great city standing behind a crooked judge or a controllable judge, and you never in all the days of your life saw that bar demand the expulsion of a brave, courageous man, fit to sit on a Federal bench. It just does not happen.

It is true that one of the members of the firm complained about was at that time the vice president of the bar association, the vice president of a great bar. Is that to his discredit? Just think a little bit. Is that to his discredit? Is it not to the credit of this man McAuliffe—whom the respondent would not trust to try to hold down the expense of this administration, the man at whom counsel for the respondent points the finger of criticism, one of the four members of the firm of Heller, Ehrmann, White & McAuliffe—that he is now selected as the president of the great Bar Association of San Francisco?

Just think about that a minute. If the people of that country believed that this judge stood foursquare against powerful influences to protect the interests that he ought to have protected, they would have acclaimed him as a great man in that community; but he does not picture himself in that way.

Where do you see him next? You see him up there in the hotel, and with whom is he conferring? He is conferring with Sam Leake.

By the way, Sam Leake does not claim to be a Christian Science practitioner. Counsel have made that statement two or three times in this record. Mr. Leake does not claim to be a Christian Science practitioner. He does not claim to be connected with Christian Science. He just has an office down there. The boys just seem to happen to drift around to talk to him about receiverships and one thing and another. They just happen to drift around. He is pretty handy about advising the judge, and in the biggest case in the respondent's court, Leake named the receiver and the attorney, in effect. I say that is a fair deduction from the facts in this case.

By the way, is it not rather funny, right at a time when the judge was in a quandary as to what he was going to do in the Russell-Colvin case, that this man Hunter, afterward appointed at Leake's suggestion, just happened to come by? You may think this fellow Strong is a fool, but he has backbone. Strong was the first man named, and the judge wanted to load on to him John Douglas Short, a $200-a-month man. Strong said, in substance, "This is a big job and I want an expert to help me do it. I want this firm that are attorneys for the stock exchange, or I want another man", whom he named, and he would not take Short.

I know there is a conflict of testimony as to who said what, and when; but there is no conflict that Strong would not take Short. That is in the case, and the judge fired him out. Then, in a quandary, the judge drifted up to the hotel and just happened to find Sam Leake sitting there; and just as they were discussing who would be a good man, and the judge did not know, this man Hunter walked through the hall. Detective-story stuff! It could happen; but it is an odd coincidence. He just happened to walk through the hall; and Hunter knew about this when they were considering this matter there before the judge, because Hunter went around to Strong and said, "What are you doing here?" Strong said, "I am trying to get a job as receiver. I am being appointed receiver"; and this man Hunter, who was afterward appointed, said, "You don't need a good man, do you?" When questioned he resorted to the old resort which men resort to when they want to get out of the responsibility fastened upon them by proven testimony, and he said, "I was just talking facetiously—just sort of shooting my head off, just talking, making conversation." He was just walking through that hotel the next evening, he was just taking his afternoon exercise, and happened to be exercising right square in front of the judge and Leake when the judge was asking Leake, "Who is a good man?" Leake says he never had thought about Hunter; but just seeing him there on the spot made him think about Hunter, and he said, "There is your man"; and the judge commissioned Leake to go over and engage Hunter if he would take it—if he would take it—if he would take it!

Then another funny thing happened. Mr. Hunter just happened—that is the effect of the testimony—to drop into Mr. Leake's room, the first time he had ever been there, though they had each lived there for years, and got hold of Mr. Leake's telephone, and telephoned to this same John Douglas Short, offering the attorneyship for the receiver, but he, Hunter, would not agree to hire him to take the job until he talked to his own employer.

I say if the picture by the respondent's conduct to the people of San Francisco was that of a strong, courageous judge, who would not permit himself to be dictated to by this big bunch of lawyers, that would be fine. San Francisco would acclaim him. But when he turns away from the possibility of hiring perhaps the greatest experts on the coast to wind up a matter like this of the Russell-Colvin Co. both lawyer and receiver, the highest, best-equipped experts, against whom not one word of suspicion has been uttered in this Chamber, and I dare say not one word could be uttered. Assuming that they are honest men—and there is nothing to indicate the contrary—the horse sense of the thing to do would have been to hire these men, Hunter and McAuliffe, who had been auditors for the stock exchange and this firm of lawyers, with the exchange for 30 years, and who testified through their chief member that in his judgment the total expense would not have gone beyond $20,000 for the lawyers and $15,000 for the receiver. Instead of taking them they took Hunter and this $200-per-month law clerk, and who in the first instance wanted to take, as I remember it, $75,000 as his fee away from the people who were the creditors of that concern and stick it in his pocket.

I want to know which is the best man, and which shows the greatest character, the man who indicated that $20,000 was enough and let the poor devils who were caught in this crash have the rest, or the man insisted on by the judge who wanted to take $75,000 out of the pockets of the widows and the orphans and the impoverished people and put it in his own pocket?

Ah, yes, in spite of these great pretensions, these high claims of honorable motives, this respondent has undertaken with no avail to hide the true man that is behind them. That is what is the matter with the situation in California.

Mr. President, I will not have time to discuss all these cases. I should have liked to discuss the Sempel-Cooley case, but the Sonora Phonograph case is the next one I want to touch on.

This respondent, in undertaking to explain some of his conduct, cites rule 53 and Judge St. Sure's interpretation of the rule. Listen to this a moment, gentlemen. Judge St. Sure's testimony with regard to rule 53 is that it is a rule to prevent the employment, as attorneys for receivers, of those persons who represented claimants. In other words, if somebody came in with a lot of claims, rule 53 protected against his employment, prevents his employment.

In the Sonora Phonograph Co. case we see Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel "dinkelspiel" into the case, coming into the respondent's good graces. How did they get in? They got in there, bringing in their hands claims of three people against that estate. There is rule 53, there is the interpretation of Judge St. Sure, and here is this judge, hiding behind this great claim of virtue, employing Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel, who bring three claims there, and, representing those three claims, prosecuting against this motor company. What are they going to say to that? What is the respondent going to do about it? What is anybody going to say among you when you meet in solemn counsel to determine your duty in this case? Where is rule 53 when Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel appear at his chamber prosecuting claims against the Sonora Phonograph Co.? Rule 53 says they may not serve the receiver, but the respondent overrules rule 53 and appoints them attorneys for the receiver. Why, nobody knows.

This judge claims that he is actuated by the motive of appointing competent people, people in whom he can put trust. If this judge acted, in appointing referees and trustees and attorneys, under the motive of appointing those in whom he has confidence, those whom he could trust, the people of San Francisco would acclaim him; but they know there are two things necessary to enable one person to trust another. You have to know of his ability to do the job, first, have you not? Now, just man to man, is there a man who sits before me today who ever trusted anybody to do a job whom he knew did not have the ability to do it? A man must have two things in order to inspire trust, namely, ability and integrity.

I have not a thing to say against Mr. Gilbert as a man of his trade. I presume he is a good telegraph operator. He testified he had never had any business experience except in connection with sending messages and supervising other people whose business was sending messages. I do not doubt he has that ability. But in the Sonora Phonograph Co. case, this company was engaged extensively in assembling and distributing phonographs and radios. They had a business all up and down that country—a mercantile business.

Did he pick a phonograph man? Did he pick anybody who was accustomed to buying or selling anything? Let us just use horse sense about this. Assuming the judge has horse sense, did he pick any merchant, did he pick anybody who had any training, or who could give him the slightest suspicion that he had the ability to do the job? No; he picked a telegraph operator. I have nothing to say about telegraph operators operating telegraph instruments, but it seems to me—and I say it with as much respect as I can have—that nobody with any sense would pick a telegraph operator to wind up a great mercantile business. This man Gilbert was one of Sam Leake's patients. Sam Leake may be the best man on earth, but we run into him every time we turn around with regard to these cases. But I must rush along.

With regard to the appointment of Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel, who showed up there with these three claims and were barred out under the rules of the court, this judge had to break down the rule of his own court to appoint them, and he knows it, and his counsel know it. He broke it down for somebody he says he never saw or heard of. And they got $20,000 for 9 days' and 2 hours' work, according to their detailed statement, 9 days of 7 hours each.

You remember there was some testimony here under which they undertook to show that they were appointed attorneys by the consent of the Irving Trust Co. This fee of $20,000 was opposed by the Irving Trust Co. and by everybody else in the case. There is that picture. They never represented the Irving Trust Co.

Can you not begin to understand how it can be that a brave people in San Francisco, and in that section of the country, cannot want this judge? Honor is not something you put on and take off like a coat. Honor is a thing which emanates involuntarily toward the object fit to be honored. If you are going to make the courts of the United States honored, you have to have them fit to be honored, and you cannot make them fit to be honored by having judges slipping in the back door, sleeping for 2 or 3 years in a room registered in the name of somebody else. Brave, courageous men do not work that way. Nobody can hold the respect of an American constituency who is not a brave, open and aboveboard, courageous man. It is this thing that strikes at the heart, it is the things proven with regard to this judge that turn wrongside out and let you see the soul of the man. It is this view that determines his standing with a grave, courageous constituency.

For the moment I am going to skip the Prudential Holding Co. case and come to as remarkable an action as has been taken in the judicial history of the United States. I make that statement without fear of any contradiction. This case shows up this judge as absolutely unfit to hold the office he has, if there were not another case in the record.

The Lumbermen's Reciprocal case was a case, insofar as this controversy is concerned, where the insurance commissioner of the great, sovereign State of California, was seeking to get possession of some eighty-odd thousand dollars and to hold it for the beneficiaries in California. There came immediately an uncompromising struggle, a fight to the death, between this judge, seeking to hold this case under the administration of Samuel Shortridge and his attorney, and this insurance commissioner of the State of California, seeking to get hold of those funds and administer them without a dollar of expense, to save every dollar of it for the poor people, maimed and halting, who had a right to draw on these funds for physical compensation.

Just get that picture, and you can begin to understand why these California people feel as they do. Just look at it. Here they are, these men who have been working in industry, injured this way, that way, the other way; a vigilant, honest official of the State of California, its insurance commissioner, moving as rapidly as he could to get hold of those funds and to hold them for California people; and this judge, fighting every inch of the ground to hold those funds, to be spent, as far as he could accomplish it, with Samuel Shortridge and Samuel Shortridge's attorney. That was the issue. There is no human being who can read that record and not conclude that that was the issue, whether this insurance commissioner should hold the funds and distribute them under his general powers, or whether the funds should be under the control of Samuel Shortridge, who charged $11 a day for his food, and undertook to deduct it from money that belonged by right, as the courts later decided, to the man with one arm off, or the man crippled for life, or whatever it was. I am telling you God Almighty's truth, as your record will disclose.

This commissioner in California had good stuff in him. He did not bend his knee to a great Federal judge. He took the case to the court of appeals. The case came back with a mandate, a solemn mandate, from the appellate court to the respondent here to turn over these funds to the insurance commissioner of California.

Now, listen to this. This judge put a condition on the mandate of the appellate court that that mandate should not go into effect if those representing the commissioner dared to appeal to the appellate court, dared to question the fees he had allowed to his favorite out of the funds over which he had no jurisdiction. Just let that soak in a minute. I would put him off the bench if he had not done another thing than that. Yes; he struck that condition out afterward when he saw this case going to the court of appeals, and he did not want to get the "hiding" that he knew the court would give him, and it would have been something worth reading if it had ever gone up to the court of appeals and had come out with that sort of a cracker tied on to its mandate.

I understand I have but 5 minutes' time remaining, and I am merely going to touch on two other cases. I will refer first to the Fageol Motors Co. case. In that case the representatives of all the parties-in-interest assembled. They picked as good an automobile man as that section of the country afforded from what we can find out about it. They wanted, being a going concern, to save their business. The respondent refused the man they wanted. Whom did the respondent select as receiver? He chose then some telegraph operator to run a great automobile business. There are some things that common sense will not tolerate us to conclude, and common sense will not tolerate us to conclude that he did not have any more sense than to do that.

I say that with just as much respect as I can have under the circumstances, and yet the Senate is asked to put back on the bench in perpetuity over a free people that kind of a man. I tell the Senate if they do it, the days of the existence of the Federal courts in America are numbered. This people—this free people—will not stand to have no control over their Federal judges unless the Senate will protect them. The bar association has taken the chances of incurring the displeasure of this judge; the witnesses have taken the chances. They come first to the other House, and have come now to the Senate as the last resort. If this body will not make it possible for the people to be safeguarded; if they will not protect the people; if, instead of looking at the situation of a sovereign people, they look at the spectacle of a man weeping at the grave of Washington, where may the people find protection? I would weep, too, anywhere if my lawyer needed to retail my tears. If I thought it would enable me to retain my job, I would have my lawyer sitting around behind a convenient bush where he could see and tell you about it, as though you were "two-by-four" jurors sitting in a justice's court.

I am not going into details—for I find my time is about up—with regard to the fees in the bankruptcy cases. I will call attention, however, to two very significant transactions. One is a case where the referee allowed a fee of $500. Those to whom the fee was allowed appealed to the respondent, and he allowed them a fee of $2,000. There is a very interesting thing, too, about the fees of Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel. They have the right name. In the Fageol Motors case, as to which they testified they did as much work as they did in the case where they got $20,000 by action of the respondent, they were allowed $6,000 by another man who passed on the value of their services. And in this case with regard to Short, we find him drawing in 1 year more than he would make in 13 years in his ordinary employment. I know there are some lawyers who like to have big fees; some of them may be in the Senate; I do not know; but I say that when a judge comes to act in a case involving the interests of widows and orphans, people who are not getting a hundred cents on the dollar, who are not, in fact, getting 25 cents on the dollar, he has no right under his oath to give a man employed as receiver a thousand percent above that which he receives for his usual employment. When a judge does that he is taking money that belongs to unfortunate people and handing it to somebody who is getting more than he ever got before in his life.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, my time has ended. I thank you for your close attention. I do not believe I will tell about anybody crying or praying. I will just go off and do the best I can and pray that you will do what is right, and I know that you are going to do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the manager has expired.

DELIBERATION WITH CLOSED DOORS

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the doors of the Senate be closed for deliberation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to.

The managers on the part of the House and the respondent and his counsel withdrew from the Chamber.

The galleries having been cleared, the Senate (at 3 o'clock and 5 minutes p.m.) proceeded to deliberate with closed doors.

At 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p.m. the doors were reopened.

The respondent, Harold Louderback, with his counsel, Walter H. Linforth, Esq., and James M. Hanley, Esq., appeared in the seats provided for them.

The managers on the part of the House appeared in the seats provided for them.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, on the advice of the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], I am taking the first and last opportunity to say that I shall ask the Senate to excuse me from voting on these various articles of impeachment, for the reason that other public duties have made it impossible for me to be present and hear more than fragments of the testimony adduced in this proceeding, and none of the arguments presented. Therefore I feel that under my oath I am not so advised as to be able to render a verdict as a juror, and I shall ask the Senate to excuse me from voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Virginia will be excused.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is absent on account of illness. He requested me to ask the court to excuse him from attendance and from voting on the various articles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Illinois will be excused.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is unavoidably absent and asks to be excused. He is detained on public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have been requested to state that on these votes pairs will not be arranged or recognized.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], I desire to announce that he is detained from the Senate because of a slight indisposition. He asks to be excused on that ground.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from New Mexico is excused.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I am asked to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has been called from the city, and I am requested to say that, if present, he would vote "not guilty."

I am also requested to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] has also been called from the city on important business, and I am directed to say that, if present, he would vote "not guilty."

I am also asked to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is absent on account of illness, and that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is also absent on account of illness. I am not advised how the latter Senators would vote if present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am also requested to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is unavoidably absent and asks to be excused from attendance and voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to have the record of the court show that yesterday I received unanimous consent to be excused from voting. I explained that, on account of illness, I had been away from the Senate, and had heard none of the testimony, and because of that the Senate excused me, but I desired to have the court record note of the fact.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I will now renew my request to be excused from voting on the first four articles of impeachment, all the articles except article 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, without any disposition to shirk any proper public responsibility, I desire to ask the Senate to release me from voting on any article except article 5. There have been various unavoidable interruptions, due to public business, which have prevented as close attention to some of the testimony as I deem necessary. Article 5 is the one article on which, on consideration, I now feel justified in voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I send the following order to the desk, ask that it be read, and request immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the proposed order.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That upon the final vote in the pending impeachment of Harold Louderback, the Secretary shall read the articles of impeachment separately and successively, and when the reading of each article shall have been concluded the Presiding Officer shall state the question thereon as follows:

"Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Harold Louderback, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article?"

Thereupon the roll of the Senate shall be called, and each Senator, as his name is called, unless excused, shall arise in his place and answer "Guilty" or "Not guilty."

Mr. BARKLEY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does any Senator have the right to ask to be excused from voting on the roll call on any article, or must he make the request in advance of the reading of the first article?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that a Senator can ask to be excused from voting on any article at any time.

Is there objection to entering the order just submitted by the Senator from Arizona? The Chair hears none, and the order will be entered.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I send another order to the desk and ask for its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the order. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered. That upon the final vote in the pending impeachment of Harold Louderback, each Senator may, within 2 days after the final vote, file his opinion in writing to be published in the printed proceedings in the case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to entering the order? The Chair hears none, and the order will be entered.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask that the clerk, in accordance with the order heretofore entered, read the first article of impeachment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the first article of impeachment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE I

That the said Harold Louderback, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned and while acting as a district judge for the northern district of California did on divers and various occasions so abuse the power of his high office that he is hereby charged with tyranny and oppression, favoritism and conspiracy, whereby he has brought the administration of justice in said district in the court of which he is a judge into disrepute, and by his conduct is guilty of misbehavior falling under the constitutional provision as ground for impeachment and removal from office.

In that the said Harold Louderback on or about the 13th day of March 1930, at his chambers and in his capacity as judge aforesaid, did willfully, tyrannically, and oppressively discharge one Addison G. Strong, whom he had on the 11th day of March 1930 appointed as equity receiver in the matter of Olmsted against Russell-Colvin Co., after having attempted to force and coerce the said Strong to appoint one Douglas Short as attorney for the receiver in said case.

In that the said Harold Louderback improperly did attempt to cause the said Addison G. Strong to appoint the said Douglas Short as attorney for the receiver by promises of allowance of large fees and by threats of reduced fees did he refuse to appoint said Douglas Short.

In that the said Harold Louderback improperly did use his office and power of district judge in his own personal interest by causing the appointment of the said Douglas Short as attorney for the receiver, at the instance, suggestion, or demand of one Sam Leake, to whom the said Harold Louderback was under personal obligation, the said Sam Leake having entered into a certain arrangement and conspiracy with the said Harold Louderback to provide him, the said Harold Louderback, with a room at the Fairmont Hotel in the city of San Francisco, Calif., and made arrangements for registering said room in his, Sam Leake's, name and paying all bills therefor in cash under an arrangement with the said Harold Louderback to be reimbursed in full or in part in order that the said Harold Louderback might continue to actually reside in the city and county of San Francisco after having improperly and unlawfully established a fictitious residence in Contra Costa County for the sole purpose of improperly removing for trial to said Contra Costa County a cause of action which the said Harold Louderback expected to be filed against him; and that the said Douglas Short did receive large and exorbitant fees for his services as attorney for the receiver in said action, and the said Sam Leake did receive certain fees, gratuities, and loans directly or indirectly from the said Douglas Short amounting approximately to $1,200.

In that the said Harold Louderback entered into a conspiracy with the said Sam Leake to violate the provisions of the California Political Code in establishing a residence in the county of Contra Costa when the said Harold Louderback in fact did not reside in said county and could not have established a residence without the concealment of his actual residence in the county of San Francisco, covered and concealed by means of the said conspiracy with the said Sam Leake, all in violation of the law of the State of California.

In that the said Harold Louderback, in order to give color to his fictitious residence in the county of Contra Costa, all for the purpose of preparing and falsely creating proof necessary to establish himself as a resident of Contra Costa County in anticipation of an action he expected to be brought against him, for the sole purpose of meeting the requirements of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California providing that all causes of action must be tried in the county in which the defendant resides at the commencement of the action, did in accordance with the conspiracy entered into with the said Sam Leake unlawfully register as a voter in said Contra Costa County, when in law and in fact he did not reside in said county and could not so register, and that the said acts of Harold Louderback constitute a felony defined by section 42 of the Penal Code of California.

Wherefore the said Harold Louderback was and is guilty of a course of conduct improper, oppressive, and unlawful and is guilty of misbehavior in office as such judge and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor in office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Harold Louderback, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The secretary will proceed to call the roll, and as the name of each Senator is called, he will rise in his place and deliver his vote.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when Mr. PITTMAN's name was called). The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has been engaged in the performance of other duties and has been unable to attend during the taking of testimony, and asks the Senate to excuse him from voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask that the message of the Senator from Nevada relating to the subject be incorporated in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The message is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D.C., May 24, 1933.

Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,

United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: For the past 6 weeks, by direction of the President, I have been engaged in the informal conferences held by our Government and representatives of various other governments in preparation for the London conference. These duties have occupied my entire time and made it impossible for me to attend the sessions of the Senate during that period and to listen to the evidence in the impeachment proceedings.

I therefore respectfully request you, on my behalf, to ask the Senate to excuse me from casting my vote in such impeachment proceedings.

The President having appointed me one of the delegates of our Government to the London conference, it will be necessary for me to be absent from the Senate during the remainder of the session. I therefore request, also, that you ask the Senate to excuse me from further attendance at the Senate during the remainder of the session.

With regards, I am, very respectfully,

KEY PITTMAN.

Mrs. CARAWAY (when her name was called). Mr. President, I should like to be excused from voting on this article.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Arkansas is excused from voting.

The roll call was concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will recapitulate the responses of Senators.

The legislative clerk recapitulated the vote, which was as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the first article of impeachment 34 Senators have voted "guilty" and 42 Senators have voted "not guilty." Less than two thirds having voted in favor of his guilt, the Senate adjudges that the respondent, Harold Louderback, is not guilty as charged in the article.

The clerk will read the next article.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE II

That Harold Louderback, judge as aforesaid, was guilty of a course of improper and unlawful conduct as a judge, filled with partiality and favoritism in improperly granting excessive, exorbitant, and unreasonable allowances as disbursements to one Marshall Woodward and to one Samuel Shortridge, Jr., as receiver and attorney, respectively, in the matter of the Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association.

And in that the said Harold Louderback, judge as aforesaid, having improperly acquired jurisdiction of the case of the Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association contrary to the law of the United States and the rules of the court did, on or about the 29th day of July, 1930, appoint one Marshall Woodward and one Samuel Shortridge, Jr., receiver and attorney, respectively, in said case, and after an appeal was taken from the order and other acts of the judge in said case to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit and the said order and acts of the said Harold Louderback having been reversed by said United States Circuit Court of Appeals and the mandate of said circuit court of appeals directed the court to cause the said receiver to turn over all of the assets of said association in his possession as receiver to the commissioner of insurance of the State of California, the said Harold Louderback unlawfully, improperly, and oppressively did sign and enter an order so directing the receiver to turn over said property to said State commissioner of insurance but improperly and unlawfully made such order conditional that the said State commissioner of insurance and any other party in interest would not take an appeal from the allowance of fees and disbursements granted by the said Harold Louderback to the said Marshall Woodward and Samuel Shortridge, Jr., receiver and attorney, respectively, thereby improperly using his said office as a district judge to favor and enrich his personal and political friends and associates to the detriment and loss of litigants in his, said judge's court, and forcing said State commissioner of insurance and parties in interest in said action unnecessary delay, labor, and expense in protecting the rights of all parties against such arbitrary, improper, and unlawful order of said judge; and that the said Harold Louderback did improperly and unlawfully seek to coerce said State commissioner of insurance and parties in interest in said action to accept and acquiesce in the excessive fees and the exorbitant and unreasonable disbursements granted by him to said Marshall Woodward and Samuel Shortridge, Jr., receiver and attorney, respectively, and did improperly and unlawfully force and coerce the said parties to enter into a stipulation modifying said improper and unlawful order and did thereby make it necessary for the State commissioner of insurance to take another appeal from the said arbitrary, improper, and unlawful action of the said Harold Louderback.

In that the said Harold Louderback did not give his fair, impartial, and judicial consideration to the objections of the said State commissioner of insurance against the allowance of excessive fees and unreasonable disbursements to the said Marshall Woodward and Samuel Shortridge, Jr., receiver and attorney, respectively, in the case of the Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association, in order to favor and enrich his friends at the expense of the litigants and parties in interest in said matter, and did thereby cause said State commissioner of insurance and the parties in interest additional delay, expense, and labor in taking an appeal to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in order to protect their rights and property in the matter against the partial, oppressive, and unjudicial conduct of said Harold Louderback.

Wherefore said Harold Louderback was, and is, guilty of a course of conduct oppressive and unjudicial and is guilty of misbehavior in office as such judge and was, and is, guilty of a misdemeanor in office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent Harold Louderback guilty or not guilty as charged in this article?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, during the testimony on this article I was absent from the Senate because of duties on a committee of the Senate, which I regarded as sufficiently important to justify me in absentsing myself. For that reason I ask to be excused from voting on this article.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Kentucky is excused from voting on article II.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I should like to make the same request, and for the same reason as expressed by the Senator from Kentucky.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Colorado is excused from voting on article II.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I desire to make the same request, for the same reason as stated by the Senator from Kentucky.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Washington is excused from voting on article II.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, for the same or similar reasons I desire to be excused from voting upon this article.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Georgia is excused from voting on article II.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, for the same reasons stated by the other Senators, I desire to be excused from voting on this article.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Michigan is excused from voting on article II.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask to be excused from voting on article II.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Kansas is excused from voting on article II.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I make the same request, that I may be excused from voting on article II.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Ohio is excused from voting on article II.

The clerk will proceed to call the roll, and each Senator when his name is called will rise in his place and deliver his vote.

The roll call was called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the call of the roll of the Senate upon the question whether the respondent is guilty or not guilty under the charge in article II, those voting guilty number 23 and those voting not guilty, 47. Less than two thirds having voted in favor of his guilt, the Senate adjudges that the respondent, Harold Louderback, is not guilty as charged in this article.

The clerk will read the third article of impeachment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE III

The said Harold Louderback, judge aforesaid, was guilty of misbehavior in office, resulting in expense, disadvantage, annoyance, and hindrance to litigants in his court in the case of the Fageol Motors Co., for which he appointed one Guy H. Gilbert receiver, knowing that the said Gilbert was incompetent, unqualified, and inexperienced to act as such receiver in said case.

In that the said Harold Louderback, judge as aforesaid, oppressively and in disregard of the rights and interests of litigants in his court, did appoint one Guy H. Gilbert as receiver for the Fageol Motors Co., knowing the said Guy H. Gilbert to be incompetent, unfit, and inexperienced for such duties, and did refuse to grant a hearing to the plaintiff, defendant, creditors, and parties in interest in the matter of the Fageol Motors Co. on the appointment of said receiver, and the said Harold Louderback did cause said litigants and parties in interest in said matter to be misinformed of his action while said Guy H. Gilbert took steps necessary to qualify as receiver, thereby depriving said litigants and parties in interest of presenting the facts, circumstances, and conditions of the said equity receivership, the nature of the business, and the type of person necessary to operate said business in order to protect creditors, litigants, and all parties in interest, and thereby depriving said parties in interest of the opportunity of protesting against the appointment of an incompetent receiver.

Wherefore the said Harold Louderback was and is guilty of a course of conduct constituting misbehavior as said judge and that said Harold Louderback was and is guilty of a misdemeanor in office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Harold Louderback, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The clerk will proceed to call the roll, and each Senator when his name is called will rise in his place and deliver his vote.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mrs. CARAWAY (when her name was called). I desire to be excused from voting on this article.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Arkansas stands excused.

Mr. COUZENS (when his name was called). I ask to be excused from voting on this article because of absence in committee meetings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Michigan stands excused.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BARKLEY. For the same reasons expressed by me on the vote on the former article I ask to be excused from voting on this article.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Kentucky stands excused.

The clerk will recapitulate the vote.

The Chief Clerk recapitulated the vote, which was as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the third article of impeachment 11 Senators have voted "guilty" and 63 Senators have voted "not guilty." Less than two thirds having voted in favor of his guilt, the Senate adjudges that the respondent, Harold Louderback, is not guilty as charged in the article.

The clerk will read the next article.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE IV

That the said Harold Louderback, judge aforesaid, was guilty of misbehavior in office, filled with partiality and favoritism, in improperly, willfully and unlawfully granting on insufficient and improper papers an application for the appointment of a receiver in the Prudential Holding Co. case for the sole purpose of benefiting and enriching his personal friends and associates.

In that the said Harold Louderback did on or about the 15th day of August 1931, on insufficient and improper application, appoint one Guy H. Gilbert receiver for the Prudential Holding Co. case when as a matter of fact and law and under conditions then existing no receiver should have been appointed, but the said Harold Louderback did accept a petition verified on information and belief by an attorney in the case and without notice to the said Prudential Holding Co. did so appoint Guy H. Gilbert the receiver and the firm of Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel attorneys for the receiver; that the said Harold Louderback in an attempt to benefit and enrich the said Guy H. Gilbert and his attorneys, Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel, failed to give his fair, impartial, and judicial consideration to the application of the said Prudential Holding Co. for a dismissal of the petition and a discharge of the receiver, although the said Prudential Holding Co. was in law entitled to such dismissal of the petition and discharge of the receiver; that during the pendency of the application for the dismissal of the petition and for the discharge of the receiver a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the said Prudential Holding Co. based entirely and solely on an allegation that a receiver in equity had been appointed for the said Prudential Holding Co., and the said Harold Louderback then and there willfully, improperly, and unlawfully, sitting in a part of the court to which he had not been assigned at the time, took jurisdiction of the case in bankruptcy and though knowing the facts in the case and of the application then pending before him for the dismissal of the petition and the discharge of the equity receiver, granted the petition in bankruptcy and did on the 2d day of October 1930 appoint the same Guy H. Gilbert receiver in bankruptcy and the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel attorneys for the receiver, knowing all of the time that the said Prudential Holding Co. was entitled as a matter of law to have the said petition in equity dismissed; in that through the oppressive, deliberate, and willful action of the said Harold Louderback acting in his capacity as a judge and misusing the powers of his judicial office for the sole purpose of benefiting and enriching said Guy H. Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel, did cause the said Prudential Holding Co. to be put to unnecessary delay, expense, and labor and did deprive them of a fair, impartial, and judicial consideration of their rights and the protection of their property, to which they were entitled.

Wherefore the said Harold Louderback was, and is, guilty of a course of conduct constituting misbehavior as said judge and that said Harold Louderback was, and is, guilty of a misdemeanor in office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Harold Louderback, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article?

The clerk will proceed to call the roll, and each Senator, as his name is called, will rise in his place and deliver his vote.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). Mr. President, in the discharge of official duties I was away from the Senate during most of the testimony on this article. I have not had an opportunity to read it fully. I ask to be excused from voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Georgia stands excused.

The roll call was concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will recapitulate the responses of Senators.

The legislative clerk recapitulated the vote, which was as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the fourth article of impeachment 30 Senators have voted "guilty" and 47 Senators have voted "not guilty." Less than two thirds having voted in favor of his guilt, the Senate adjudges that the respondent, Harold Louderback, is not guilty as charged in the article.

The clerk will read the next article of impeachment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE V (AS AMENDED)

It is intended by article 5 to charge, and it is charged, that the reasonable and probable result of Harold Louderback's action in his capacity as judge in making decisions and orders in actions pending in his court and before him as said judge and by the method of appointing receivers and attorneys for receivers, by appointing incompetent receivers and attorneys, by his relationship and transactions with one Sam Leake, and by the relationship and transactions of the said Sam Leake with such appointees of the said respondent made possible and probable by the action and attitude of the said Harold Louderback, and by displaying a high degree of indifference to the interest of estates and parties in interest in receiverships before him and in his court, and by displaying a high degree of interest in making it possible for certain individuals and firms to derive large fees from the funds of such estates, has been to create a general condition of wide-spread fear and distrust and disbelief in the fairness and disinterestedness of the official actions of the said Harold Louderback and to create by his said acts, deeds, and relationships, contrary to his individual and official duty, a favorable condition and a cause for the development naturally and inevitably of rumors and suspicions destructive of public confidence in and respect for the said Harold Louderback as an individual and a judge to the scandal and disrepute of his said court and the administration of justice therein and prejudicial generally to the public respect for and public confidence in the Federal judiciary. Wherefore, the said Harold Louderback was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of misdemeanors in office.

It is hereby alleged and charged that the conduct of said Harold Louderback as alleged in articles I, II, III, and IV, and as herein-after alleged, in its general and aggregate result has been such as reasonably and probably calculated to destroy public confidence insofar as he and his court is concerned in that degree of disinterestedness and fidelity to judicial duty and responsibility which the public interest requires shall be held by the people in the Federal courts and in those who administer them, and which for a Federal judge to hurt or destroy is a crime and misdemeanor of the highest order.

First, specifying as indicative of and disclosing the character and judicial attitude of said Harold Louderback revealed by his acts and official conduct to the people among whom he has jurisdiction, and the cause for the loss of public confidence of the bar and people of the northern district of California, and particularly of the city of San Francisco, where the principal business of such court is transacted, on or about December 19, 1929, the said Harold Louderback appointed one Guy H. Gilbert receiver of the Sonora Phonograph Co., a going concern extensively engaged in the business of receiving and distributing radios and phonographs, the said Guy H. Gilbert being a personal and political friend of the said Harold Louderback, and an intimate friend and financial contributor to one Sam Leake, hereinafter referred to, the said Harold Louderback knowing at the time of such appointment that the whole training and experience of the said Guy H. Gilbert had been as operator and employee of a telegraph company, and the said Harold Louderback at the time of such appointment knowing with certainty that the said Guy H. Gilbert was without qualification to discharge the duties of such receivership, that the said Guy H. Gilbert was appointed such receiver by the said Harold Louderback without regard to the interest of such estate in receivership and in disregard thereof and of the interest of creditors and parties in interest and in violation of the official duty of the said Harold Louderback. That the said Gilbert after said appointment continued in his regular and usual duties and employment as employee of said telegraph company, drawing his accustomed salary during his employment of approximately 6 months as such receiver, and received for such services from the funds of the estate of said Sonora Phonograph Co. the sum of $6,800, all of which facts became the subject of newspaper comments and matters of common knowledge throughout and beyond the northern judicial district of California to the hurt of public confidence in the said Harold Louderback, judge of said court, and to the hurt and standing of the Federal judiciary. It also became a matter of newspaper comment in connection with that receivership matter and others, that theretofore, about 1925 or 1926, the said Gilbert had been appointed by the said Harold Louderback when the said Harold Louderback was a judge of the Superior Court of California, an appraiser of certain real estate, the said Harold Louderback well knowing at the time of such appointment that the said Gilbert was without any qualification to appraise the value of such real estate, and in truth the said Gilbert never saw said real estate and that the said Gilbert did not undertake to assist in the appraisal of said real estate, only signing the report which was presented to him, for which services he was allowed the sum of $500.

The said Gilbert was also theretofore appointed receiver by Harold Louderback in the Stempel-Cooley case in 1929, bankruptcy, collecting during 3 or 4 months $12,000 rents, for which he was allowed a fee of $500. In this matter, after conversation with the said Sam Leake, the said Gilbert appointed as his attorney one John Douglas Short, who was an employee in the law office of Erskine & Erskine.

The said Short was afterward, in March 1931, appointed attorney by one H. B. Hunter, receiver in what is known in this proceeding as the Russell-Colvin Co. case, and which will hereinafter be specified with reference to. In the said Russell-Colvin case the said H. B. Hunter, having been appointed such receiver by the said Harold Louderback, at the suggestion of the said Sam Leake, who theretofore had suggested to the said Gilbert the appointment of the said John Douglas Short in the Stempel-Cooley case, and the said H. B. Hunter, after his appointment as such receiver, appointed the said John Douglas Short as his attorney in said Russell-Colvin case, the said Harold Louderback allowing the said John Douglas Short the sum of $50,000 on account as attorney for said receiver, H. B. Hunter.

Preceding the appointment of the said H. B. Hunter in the said Russell-Colvin case, the said Harold Louderback had appointed one Addison G. Strong to be receiver therein, who because he would not designate as his attorney the said John Douglas Short as claimed by the said Addison G. Strong, or either the said John Douglas Short or certain other attorneys as claimed by the said Harold Louderback, the said Addison G. Strong was summarily dismissed as receiver and the said Hunter appointed in his stead, who on the same day of his said appointment as receiver by the said Harold Louderback tendered to the said John Douglas Short the attorneyship in said receivership matter.

On the 25th day of March 1931 one W. L. Hathaway, father-in-law of the said John Douglas Short, advanced as a loan to the said Sam Leake the sum of $1,000 in cash, and 2 days thereafter the said John Douglas Short, in an involved family transaction, paid to the said W. L. Hathaway from the compensation received as attorney in the Russell-Colvin Co. matter the sum of $5,000. Three months later the said Hathaway gave to the said Leake the further sum of $250.

When the said Harold Louderback appointed the said H. B. Hunter, as aforesaid, receiver in the said Russell-Colvin Co. case at the suggestion of the said Sam Leake, and the said Hunter in turn appointed the said John Douglas Short attorney for him in the Russell-Colvin Co. case, he, the said Harold Louderback, resided at the Fairmont Hotel in a room registered and held in the name of the said Sam Leake, such arrangement being effected in conspiracy between the said Harold Louderback and Sam Leake to aid the said Harold Louderback in carrying out a certain plan and design, the said Harold Louderback pretending to reside in Contra Costa County while actually and in fact residing in the city of San Francisco at the Fairmont Hotel in a room registered in the name of the said Sam Leake, the purpose and design of which arrangement having to do with the possible venue of a legal action which the said Harold Louderback contemplated might be brought against him. To further strengthen and add color to this pretended residence in Contra Costa County the said Harold Louderback registered as a voter in said Contra Costa County in violation of the laws of California, all of which transactions by the acts and conduct of the said Harold Louderback are involved in and mixed up with the official status and standing and transactions of the said Harold Louderback and are known to the people of the northern district of California and beyond such district to the disgrace and discredit of his office and to the hurt of public confidence therein and of the Federal judiciary. Thereby, as a result of such transactions, putting himself under obligation to, dependent upon, and under the influence of the said Sam Leake in a manner and to a degree utterly inconsistent with that required by the public interest of a Federal judge; and thereby putting himself, the said Harold Louderback, in an attitude with regard to obedience to law and the rights granted to litigants by the law and with regard to the standards of open candid conduct necessary to preserve for the public official that respect and confidence required by the public interest within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution requiring of Federal judges good behavior as a condition upon which their tenure of office depends. That said conduct is bad behavior and constitutes a forfeiture of the right of the said Harold Louderback to hold his, the said office of judge of the northern district of California.

In August 1931 the said Harold Louderback, without a hearing, upon a petition verified by an attorney "upon information and belief" and without bond of indemnity, granted an equity receivership for the Prudential Holding Co., a concern engaged in extensive real-estate transactions, and appointed the said Guy H. Gilbert as receiver, who in turn designated Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel as his attorneys. The first information the company had of the matter was when Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel appeared in the office of said Prudential Holding Co. to take charge of its affairs. The petition filed without truth or justification was resisted by said Prudential Holding Co., but the said Harold Louderback refused to dismiss the equity receivership matter until an application for receivership in bankruptcy was applied for, which application was based upon the grounds of the said equity receivership, wrongfully entertained. The bankruptcy matter fell in the division of Judge St. Sure, one of the judges of the said northern district of California. During the temporary absence of Judge St. Sure, the said Harold Louderback, sitting in Judge St. Sure's division, named the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel receiver and attorneys, respectively, in the bankruptcy matter, and 2 days later dismissed the equity receivership. Upon the return of Judge St. Sure to his division, he, Judge St. Sure, promptly dismissed the bankruptcy proceeding because no insolvency was shown. No fees were allowed by Judge St. Sure.

The proceedings in the matter and the facts, transactions, and statements therein became a matter of general knowledge within and beyond the said northern district of California, with its reasonable and probable and inevitable consequence to arouse dread and apprehension of the court and judicial power possessed by the said Harold Louderback on the part of the people generally and particularly of those whose property might be seized upon through the instrumentality of such court, and generally to make said court disrespected and hateful. The said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel had theretofore and over the protest of the parties in interest, on the ground that it was excessive, been allowed a fee of $20,000 by the said Harold Louderback in the Sonora Phonograph Co. case, in which case they had also been associated with the said Gilbert, appointed by the said Harold Louderback as receiver therein.

Some 6 months after the appointment of the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel as receiver and attorneys, respectively, in the said Prudential Holding Co. case, to wit, on the 17th day of February 1932, they were appointed by the said Harold Louderback receiver and attorneys, respectively, in the Fageol Motors Co. case. This company was known in the said northern district of California as one of the more important concerns in that part of the country. It had assets of $3,000,000 book value and liabilities amounting to $1,700,000 with automobile manufacturing, assembling plants, branch offices, properties, and extensive operations in California, Washington, Oregon, and Utah. The said Harold Louderback knew and the people of that community knew at the time the said Guy H. Gilbert was appointed as receiver of said Fageol Motors Co. that the said Guy H. Gilbert was utterly without qualification to discharge the duties of said receivership. That said appointment of said Gilbert and said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel was made in tyrannical and oppressive disregard of the rights and interest of the parties in interest, of the duty to conserve the assets of said company, and in disregard of his duty by the said Harold Louderback to the Government which had commissioned him to be one of its judges. That the facts and circumstances surrounding the appointment of the said Gilbert, as receiver, and the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel, attorneys, in said receivership matter and the method of procedure therein on the part of the said Harold Louderback inevitably as a necessary consequence were prejudicial to the judiciary and was to the scandal and disrepute of the court presided over by the said Harold Louderback and to the administration of justice therein, in that the said Fageol Motors Co. getting into financial difficulty the principal creditors of said company and the representatives of said Fageol Motors Co., after full conference and consideration, decided by agreement to apply to the Federal court for a receivership and after careful consideration agreed upon Edward Fuller, of Oakland, a former official of the Chevrolet Motor Co. with extensive experience and demonstrated business and financial ability not only in the automobile business but in other matters of large proportions. Pursuant to said agreement, on the 17th day of February 1922, the papers were all prepared carrying out the plan agreed upon by Fageol Motors Co. and its creditors and the petition for receiver was filed in the Federal court of the northern district of California. By plan of assignment determined by drawing numbers from a bag, this matter fell to the said Judge Louderback, there being three judges of said district.

The parties in interest, representatives of the company and of the principal creditors, went to his chambers to see the said Judge Louderback with the papers in said matter, arriving shortly before the time for the noon recess of his court, but were advised by the clerk of the said judge that the noon recess would be delayed until 12:30, the said clerk asking what it was desired to see the judge about, and was told that it was the receivership matter of the Fageol Motors Co., that the persons present represented the company and the larger creditors of said company, and that they had agreed upon Edward Fuller as a proper person for receiver, and to advise the judge of that fact, and that it was desired to discuss the matter with him at 1:30 p.m. At that time the parties in interest returned to see Judge Louderback and were told that Judge Louderback had got off for lunch earlier than anticipated, had some engagement, and would not return until 2:30. At 2:30 the parties in interest returned and were told by the clerk of the said Harold Louderback that Judge Louderback had already appointed the said Gilbert in said matter, and that Judge Louderback was not there. In this matter the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel were also appointed attorneys for said receiver. The parties in interest, under threat of going into bankruptcy, which action would probably have ousted the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel entirely, effected an agreement with the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel by which other representatives chosen by the said parties in interest were to have effective control of the business and legal matters of the said motors company, the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel offering no obstruction to said representatives. The said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel accepted under the circumstances from the assets of said company the sum of $6,000, and the said Gilbert received approximately the same amount. The facts and circumstances connected with this matter show to the people of said district that the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel were not selected by the said Harold Louderback primarily because he deemed the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel best qualified to administer said estate but resulted in large degree from the desire of the said Harold Louderback to procure for the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel pecuniary benefits from the assets of this concern which had been driven by financial difficulty to seek the protection of the court of the said Harold Louderback, all of which facts and circumstances received general publicity in the said northern district of California to the scandal and disrepute of the court of said district, and when taken in connection with the explanation and excuse offered by the said Harold Louderback for the appointment of the said Gilbert as receiver in this matter and in other matters where the public knew the said Gilbert was utterly unqualified, that he, the said Harold Louderback, in so appointing the said Gilbert was acting under the control of a sense of judicial responsibility requiring him to appoint persons known to him of efficiency and integrity to manage the affairs of estates in receivership, which explanation and excuse also has been given wide publicity in said district, the reasonable and necessary and inevitable result of the claim of such high motive under the circumstances was to create the impression and public belief that the said Harold Louderback was attempting by such claim to hide his lack of such actuating motive and to hide his real motive for making such appointments by an insincere and hypocritical claim of having been actuated by them, to the disgust and humiliation of the people of the northern district of California and to the hurt of the public interest.

In September 1930, in the court of the said Harold Louderback, an equity receivership petition was filed in the Golden State Asparagus case, seeking an economical conduct of the business while its obligations were being adjusted. When the receiver was appointed the said Harold Louderback agreed to submit to said receiver a list of attorneys from which he could name his counsel; but the list was not furnished. Instead the said Harold Louderback designated as attorney for said receiver the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel without reference to the receiver. The legal work connected with the conduct of the receivership was not appreciably more difficult or voluminous than that incident to the ordinary running of the business, which had theretofore cost the business less than $1,000 per year. The said Harold Louderback allowed the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel $14,000 on account, while he denied the uncontested application for $1,500 each, reasonable fees, made by the attorneys for plaintiff and defendant who had performed the only substantial legal services rendered in the case, when they prevented a forced sale of the property. These attorneys in an effort to protect the assets of the said Asparagus Co. had opposed the payment of the fees allowed to Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel on the ground that they were excessive. These acts of said Harold Louderback were well known to the public in and beyond said northern district of California, and cumulatively added to the disrespect, apprehension, and public contempt.

In the Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association equity receivership, a Texas insurance corporation doing business in California, the company getting into financial difficulty, the Insurance Commissioner for the State of California seized the assets of said company in the State of California for the benefit of California policyholders. It was determined as a matter of procedure to ask for an equity receivership with the plan that said insurance commissioner be appointed so as to permit him to continue to hold said assets and administer them without extra cost for a receiver and resultant diminution of the company's California assets. Instead, however, the said Harold Louderback designated one Samuel Shortridge, Jr., as receiver. Thereupon, the official of the State of California took proper steps to terminate proceedings in the Federal court. The said Harold Louderback enjoined the insurance commissioner from proceeding under the laws of the State of California.

Appeal was taken to the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals and reversal had on the ground of lack of Federal jurisdiction, and the property ordered to be turned over to the officials of California. To this order and mandate of the Circuit Court of Appeals the said Harold Louderback without any authority of law imposed a condition that said order and mandate should be complied with, provided there be no appeal taken from the order made by him, the said Louderback, allowing a fee of $6,000 to the said Shortridge and his attorney. All of which facts and circumstances became published and known in said northern district of California. By such acts the said Harold Louderback exhibited himself to the public as being willing to obstruct the officials of the State of California in their effort to conserve for citizens of California the assets of said insurance company which they had impounded, willing to assert a jurisdiction which he did not possess, willing to defy a mandate of the circuit court of appeals and attach an illegal and unconscionable condition to said mandate in order to penalize and discourage the exercise of a constitutional right of appeal for the definite and obvious purpose of making sure so far as possible by such illegal action and coercion, that the said Shortridge and his attorney would be paid from the assets of said insurance company so impounded, the fees which he, the said Harold Louderback, had allowed, all to the scandal and discredit of the said Harold Louderback and his court and prejudicial to the dignity of the judiciary.

Wherefore, the said Harold Louderback has been and is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office and has not conducted himself with good behavior.

During the reading,

Mr. McADOO. May I ask that the reading clerk proceed a little more slowly? We do not get the reading at all here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read as requested.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 1759) granting the consent of Congress to the Mill Four Drainage District, in Lincoln County, Oreg., to construct, maintain, and operate dams and dikes to prevent the flow of waters of Yaquina Bay and River into Nutes Slough, Boones Slough, and sloughs connected therewith; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 1760) for the relief of the Snare & Triest Co., now Frederick Snare Corporation; and

A bill (S. 1761) for the relief of the Globe Shipping Co., Inc., of New York, N.Y. (successors of the Globe Shipping Co.); to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 1762) granting a pension to Margaret Nicholson; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO HOME LOAN BILL

Mr. GORE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 5240, the so-called "home loan bill," which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO PUBLIC WORKS BILL

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. McNARY each submitted an amendment, and Mr. BANKHEAD submitted two amendments, intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to Senate bill 1712, the industrial control and public works bill, which were severally referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

REFUNDING OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT BONDS AT LOWER RATE OF INTEREST

Mr. BONE submitted a resolution (S.Res. 85), which was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas the Government of the United States finds it necessary to undertake a program of public works in order to afford employment for its unemployed citizens, and current revenues are insufficient to provide adequate funds for this program; and

Whereas great sums of money are being paid to the holders of war time and other Government obligations to maintain a rate of interest in excess of that now justified by the credit of the Government of the United States of America; and

Whereas the British treasury has successfully converted its war-time obligations from a rate approximating 5 percent per annum to a rate of less than $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent per annum, effecting a saving of \$38,000,000 a year by an appeal for voluntary reduction in interest paid to the holders of its bonds; and

Whereas the French treasury, by appeal to the patriotism of the French bondholders, also succeeded in bringing about a substantial reduction in the interest rate on its outstanding obligations; and

Whereas the Government of the United States has demonstrated its ability to borrow at less than the present average price of its outstanding obligations, particularly war-time obligations; and

Whereas an appeal to patriotic holders of Government obligations, particularly war-time obligations, to convert their bonds into new bonds bearing a lower and more equitable yield would, if successful, tend to equalize the burden which must be borne by all sections of the country in the hour of national difficulty; and

Whereas practically all other elements of the country, excepting only the creditors of the Government of the United States, have either been called upon or compelled to contribute toward the maintenance of the national credit; and

Whereas reduction of the interest burden would strengthen the national credit and greatly increase the borrowing power of the Government of the United States; and

Whereas the Government of the United States is faced with the immediate necessity of finding additional sources of revenue with which to pay interest on expenditures made necessary by the national emergency; and

Whereas many of the holders of Government obligations pay no taxes on the income derived from these obligations; and

Whereas creditors of the Government of the United States have generally been insistent upon rigid national economy, not, however, including reduction in interest on Government obligations; and

Whereas such a reduction is consistent with a program of national economy and with prevailing prices for Government money: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States request, and it hereby does request, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to call immediately upon holders of United States Government bonds, particularly those issued to finance the World War, to exchange their bonds for new bonds of an issue to be known as the new Liberty Loan of 1933, and bearing a lower rate of interest, which would effect a saving as nearly as possible sufficient to service such additional loans as may be made necessary by the pending public-works program, and by such other emergency needs of the Government as the President may see fit to prescribe, such conversion loan to bear interest, however, at a rate not less than the rate paid to depositors in United States Postal Savings banks.

"WHAT ABOUT GOLD?"—ARTICLE BY F. A. VANDERLIP

MR. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a very interesting article by Frank A. Vanderlip, a well-known financier and economist, published in the Saturday Evening Post, on gold and its historical position in our monetary system.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post, May 27, 1933]

WHAT ABOUT GOLD?

By Frank A. Vanderlip

There are few words so deeply ingrained in our minds as is this word "gold." It has had deep-rooted significance in human thinking for 3,000 years. The uses of the metal have become so complex that it is doubtful if the most highly trained specialists have more than a vague conception of its complete economic ramifications. But the word has an elemental concept in every mind; gold is the epitome of wealth.

If I were asked to recommend a course of reading designed to give one as complete knowledge as possible regarding gold, I would not start with any book on economics nor any address made by a banker. I would rather head the list with such a book as Frazier's Golden Bough, which is an anthropological study of primitive psychology, particularly a history of superstitions and social taboos. The reason for that is that to understand the subject of gold first requires a mental housecleaning. One ought to get rid of preconceptions, of misconceptions, economic superstitions, and hereditary beliefs. That is extremely difficult and has been accomplished by few among the whole breed of economists and bankers, to say nothing about the layman's state of mind. Veritable golden streets in paradise rest on no better foundation than do many soberly regarded, orthodox views concerning the functions of gold in our present-day economy.

HOW HARD MONEY BEGAN

As our conception of gold has its roots running back nearly 3,000 years into history, it would be useful to reflect on the primitive economic origin of that conception.

When men passed out of the barter stage, in which goods could only be exchanged for other goods, it was obviously necessary to invent some means for giving a common price measure to all those things desirable to exchange, one for another. The precious metals, naturally, became such a price measure. They were inherently desirable. They had numerous advantages. Their rarity prevented sudden additions to the total stock; they offered a compact storehouse of value; they could be easily transported or stored; being homogeneous, they could be divided; they were easily recognized and not readily simulated. So it was the natural thing after flocks and herds ceased to be a common measure that the precious metals should begin to perform that function. The earliest coinage we know about was begun by the Greeks in the seventh century, B.C. There had been material advance in civilization and great social development before mankind got out of the barter stage and started to develop anything like a price system as we know it.

Throughout primitive time, so it came about, after man abandoned shells, sheep, and cattle as measures of value in exchange for other things, the money used was hard money. It was coined copper, silver, and gold; and its function was easily understood.

The next step grew out of the necessity for the safe-keeping of any hoard of coin. Thieves might break in and there was need of strong boxes. The safest strong boxes were the property of the goldsmiths, so it naturally came about that men would take coin to a goldsmith in whom they had confidence and leave it with him. Written receipts for the deposited coin was the next obvious step. If there was general reliance on the probity of the goldsmith, those paper receipts became in a sense the equivalent of the gold itself. Instead of drawing out the gold when wanted, such a receipt might be as acceptable for the time being as the actual gold coin which had been warehoused in the goldsmith's strong box. The amount of the receipt might not correspond with the size of a particular payment, and it came about that the individual would write an order on the goldsmith. Up to the time of that phase, the goldsmith, who was ultimately to become the banker, was merely a warehouseman; but the goldsmith's receipts were in circulation and were performing the function of money. There was then, or should have been, always an amount of gold in the strong box equal to the receipts that were outstanding.

Let us try to picture what was the next phase, for it was an important step. Let us imagine a small cargo of rugs arriving at a Mediterranean port. Suppose there were two wealthy and experienced merchants who were prepared to compete for the cargo, and who each had, in his own or in the goldsmith's strong box, the gold necessary to complete the transaction. There were thus two competitors, and the resulting price would have been within the range of their particular ideas of value.

Now, let us suppose that there was also a shrewd, adventurous, and successful young merchant, confident he could successfully resell the rugs, but lacking sufficient gold to make the original purchase. Reflecting on this situation, eager to develop his business, he conceived an economic invention. He may have looked toward the goldsmith, whose coffers were filled with other people's coin, against which there was outstanding an equal amount of the goldsmith's receipts. These receipts were "as good as gold"; they were passing from hand to hand; few were presented, and the actual gold lay there uncalled for.

PAPER GIVEN FOR GOLD

Our adventurous young merchant convinced the goldsmith that if he would loan him, not gold but merely a written receipt for gold, he could compete for the rugs. He convinced the goldsmith that when the owner of the cargo of rugs had completed their sale he in turn intended to purchase another cargo of goods in the local market; that this same gold receipt would be the means by which the sale of the rugs and the purchase of the new cargo were to be consummated; and that the gold itself was likely to remain untouched. The receipt the merchant borrowed would thus in turn be used by the original rug seller to buy other goods; and in due course, after the rugs had been retailed, the debt, with interest, would be paid and there would be profit both to the merchant and the goldsmith. It was impressed upon the goldsmith's mind that if he thus wrote a receipt for gold it would not mean that someone would come with it and demand coin, but that the order would circulate as other orders were circulating—as money—and could be canceled as the rugs found ultimate purchasers. The goldsmith agreed to the plan, and modern commercial-deposit banking was born.

A NEW BURDEN LAID UPON GOLD

Now, let us trace the effect. Instead of two competitors for the rugs there were three. The total purchasing medium of the community had been increased.

Higher prices resulted because a new man came into the field with buying ability. Increased buying power had been created by credit. A new factor in price making had been created which clearly tended to advance the price. The goldsmith was recompensed for this gold order and he found the business safe and profitable. He expanded the plan.

The goldsmith could increase the amount of these orders as long as he kept on hand a sufficient supply of coin to make it safe for him to have outstanding more orders than he held gold. In order to be safe, the amount of such orders had to be limited and held within sound limits by that element of safety—an adequate gold reserve. That is exactly what is meant by the fateful percentage in modern bank statements which is called "the percentage of reserve to liability."

Here we see a new burden laid upon gold; a new function that it must perform. In addition to serving as a medium of exchange—that is to say, becoming the one commodity compared to which the worth of all other commodities was related—and in addition to its being a storehouse of wealth, it became a reserve upon which to base that form of credit by which the goldsmith had more receipts for gold outstanding than he had gold in his strong box. Coins and the receipts for coins could now be exchanged for every other sort of property. If one did not wish to buy other property for the time being, both the coins and the receipts became a store and representative of wealth. So we now see three functions of gold.

As trade developed between different communities and different countries, the goods brought into a community substantially balanced the goods taken out; but if the total goods brought into a country exceeded in value the total taken out, there was a net deficit that must be settled in something other than goods. That could be settled by the shipment of gold.

There was a regulatory action here that was important. The country that imported more than it exported, having to settle the difference in gold, immediately experienced a profound effect arising from that drain on its gold stock. Gold was the money basis. Its abundance meant higher prices; its scarcity meant lower prices. The country that shipped gold in sufficient amount experienced a sharp fall in the prices of all things. That made it a poor place for other countries to ship their goods to and, conversely, a good market for foreigners to buy in. Thus that country's balance of trade was automatically regulated; if it bought too much and shipped too little, settling the difference in gold, the loss of the gold depressed prices, the country bought less and sold more, and thus restored its trade balance. We have now considered gold used in four ways—as a medium of exchange, as a storehouse of value, as a reserve against bank deposits, and as a means for settling foreign-trade balances.

Let us come forward a few hundred years and examine our own money today. First, we have exactly the same type of paper that the goldsmith originally issued—warehouse receipts. As metal was more unwieldy than paper and as we grew used to the convenience of paper money, the Government issued gold and silver certificates. They represented gold and silver coin actually deposited in the Treasury, against which the Government issued its receipts.

A gold certificate, on which is printed the statement that there has been deposited gold in the Treasury which will be returned on demand in exchange for the certificate, meant that anyone holding such a gold certificate was free to make that exchange. The contract was the simplest and plainest of agreements. The gold had been deposited in the Treasury, a receipt had been given for it, just as the early goldsmiths gave receipts, and on surrender of the receipt the gold was to be handed over. That was not an easy contract to change. In effect it was changed by the emergency legislation passed early in March, although we still professed to be on the gold basis.

WHEN EVERYBODY WANTS HIS MONEY

What had happened was that the public had made a run on gold. Many millions of gold were being withdrawn in exchange for paper currency which bore the promise that it was exchangeable for gold. People had long preferred to have a paper representative of gold instead of gold itself. They now became fearful that the banking situation, plus the fact that the Government was spending more than it obtained from taxes, would lead to further issues of paper currency by the Government or by the Federal Reserve banks, and they preferred to have the veritable gold coin to any promise to pay gold coin. This demand for gold came in such a rush that it seemed impossible that it could be met, great as was our supply of gold.

Emergency legislation was hurriedly passed under which the President directed that no more gold should be paid out, that none should be shipped abroad except under special licenses, that all gold coin held by individuals should be returned, and severe penalties were suggested compelling such return. More than 500 millions of gold were returned in exchange for paper money which still legally promised that it was convertible into gold. Instead of the Government frankly breaking that promise when it was found impossible to keep it, it was made a crime to hoard gold. It was still declared that we were on a gold basis.

All forms of money in this country have been legally convertible into gold, either directly or indirectly. This was explicitly provided by a law passed in 1900, but that conversion has actually broken down.

Practically all debt obligations of the Government are also payable in gold by their terms. That obligation has broken down. In spite of that fact, nine hundred millions of Treasury notes were sold on the 15th of March, and those notes still contained the provision that they were payable in gold of the present standard. This was a curious example of anthropological taboo, illustrating the adherence in form to an engagement regarding which there was in fact no true intention to discharge the obligation.

A function of money which is of the greatest importance in a capitalistic economy is its value in relation to deferred payments. Let us think just what that means. All debts payable at some future time are deferred payments: Life-insurance policies, old-age annuities—every form of obligation that is a definite agreement to pay a given number of dollars at a future date comes under this head. Whoever parts with his money today with the expectation of getting it back at some future time is vitally concerned with the future value of the dollar. It is important to get back the dollar with interest, but it is just as important to know what goods that dollar will then buy.

Suppose one is contemplating providing for old age by purchasing an annuity. He knows what his dollars are worth in exchange

If all instinct for thrift and careful provision for the future is not to be destroyed, it is necessary that the long-range value of the dollar should not change substantially from the present value. We are inclined to believe that it will not and to make sacrifices of purchasing ability today in order to insure that at some time in the future we may have the same purchasing ability plus the accumulation of interest.

As a matter of fact, we have no such assurance of the dollar's unchanging value. The record of the price level and our experience are vivid proofs of this. Nevertheless we go on as instinctively as bees store up honey, parting with our present dollars in the instinctive belief that the dollars we hope to get back will, in general, have the same command over the acquisition of goods as did the dollars we invested. A part of that belief is tied up with our traditional feeling that gold is gold; that the same number of grains of gold that constitute a dollar today will, if maintained as the standard dollar, insure the stability of the dollar through a generation and provide the same quantity of things in exchange that they do now, if we will only hold to the same number of grains of gold. We have seen the value of those grains of gold nearly double in the 3 years of the depression. We saw it almost cut in two in the years of the Great War and those immediately following. But most people cling to the belief that a dollar redeemable in a fixed number of grains of gold is an unchanging standard, cling to it with the persistence with which a primitive mind clings to a superstition.

I remember a calculation which I made in 1920 to illustrate what was then going on in the way of a changing value of the dollar. The position was the reverse of what we have recently experienced. Prices were rising, or gold was depreciating, whichever way one chooses to regard it.

This was my calculation: A thousand dollars placed in a savings bank and left to accumulate at compound interest will double in about 18 or 20 years. If a person had placed a thousand dollars in a savings bank in 1902 he would have had $2,000 in 1920. For his original thousand dollars he could have bought a given amount of general goods. After 20 years of abstinence, such a depositor in a savings bank, undertaking to buy the things he could have originally bought with his thousand dollars, would have found that he was unable to buy twice as much for two thousand as he could originally have bought for one thousand. The distressing fact was that to have bought what he could originally have purchased for a thousand dollars he would have to add to the two thousand accumulated in his savings account an additional thousand. The reason for that is that the price index, which in 1900 was 56.1, had advanced in 1920 to 154.4, nearly 200 percent.

The advance in the value of the dollar in the past 3 years has not been so great as was the decline in the period I have been reviewing, but it has been sufficient to illustrate vividly the opposite side of the picture. The man who borrowed money in 1929 is at almost as great disadvantage as was experienced by the creditor in the period of rising prices. During all that time, however, the dollar represented the same number of grains of gold.

There is general understanding that the course of prices is influenced by the quantity of money. The economists have embodied that in what they term the "quantity theory of money." In its simplest form, this means that in an isolated community having a steady volume of business and doing all that business on a cash basis where the matter of bank credits is not involved, there is a direct relation between the price level and the volume of currency. In other words, in such a community where all other influences are cut off, if the volume of currency is doubled, prices will be doubled, and if the volume is halved, prices will be cut in two.

That is a simple theory, easily understood. It should not be too readily applied to more complex conditions. In practice, when we introduce all the complexities of bank credit as a purchasing medium, and the complications of velocity—the greater or less speed with which money circulates—the practical results bear little apparent relation to the volume of money. Of course, it is obvious that if there is a sufficient increase in a country's currency, prices will advance. We saw that when a postage stamp in Germany cost 600,000 marks. No one should, however, accept the simple statement of the quantity theory of money and expect, in our complex order, to see an exact relationship between prices and the volume of currency.

POST-WAR BURDENS ON GOLD

Our traditional faith in gold is buttressed by a long experience prior to the outbreak of the Great War, in which the gold standard, operated by highly expert English bankers, functioned with a fair degree of satisfaction. The memory of much of that period is the foundation of the economic thinking of most mature business men. It is true that England has been off the gold basis for 36 of the past 136 years, but, nevertheless, there was so long a period during which London was the financial center and the world's clearing house, and the English bankers managed the gold standard with such effectiveness that it has left the belief firmly ingrained in the minds of men who were in business during the latter part of that period that an unchangeable gold standard is the foundation cornerstone of the monetary system, that any criticism of it is heretical, and that any proposal to change it is dangerous and harebrained.

There are some features connected with the post-war situation, however, which need to be considered before one can too hopefully believe that it is possible to go back to such an orderly working of the gold standard as characterized a long period prior to 1914. There have been new obligations placed upon gold which must in the future be controlled if the gold standard is again to work with the smoothness with which it once did.

I have already tried to explain some of the fundamental obligations which lie on gold: Its use as currency, as a storehouse of value, as a reserve basis against paper currency, and as a reserve control on the banker, limiting him from keeping more loans upon his books than his reserve of currency to meet the probable currency withdrawals will warrant. This last function, let it be remembered, is just the same limitation that was placed upon the goldsmith issuing more receipts for gold than his store of actual coin made it safe to do. Then there is the regulatory function which comes into play when a country's imports exceed its exports.

We have found, since the Great War, that this function is not working well. It has been interfered with by a general movement throughout the world to increase customs barriers. Instead of permitting a normal flow of gold to correct a trade balance, tariff barriers, quotas, and import licenses have been devised to keep out goods and to force gold shipments in their place. We have ourselves offered a notable illustration of this attempt, but similar political theories have become almost world-wide, and gold now flows from one country to another impelled by motives quite apart from settling normal trade balances.

Since the war, there have come into play still other impressive obligations upon gold. During the time prior to the war, when England was managing the gold standard, that country was practically the only important investor in foreign securities. If a country needed to ship gold in order to balance its foreign trade, England would frequently accept debt obligations, either of the government or of individuals in the country concerned, instead of compelling an adjustment by gold shipments. Her growing wealth permitted her to do this on a large scale. At the outbreak of the war, she had accumulated an equivalent of $20,000,000,000 in such foreign obligations. During and since the war, there grew up a great mass of internationally owned securities. Such securities can be thrown back upon a market and turned into a demand upon gold having no reference to foreign trade, but they do turn into an absolute command over the country's gold base.

We do not have much accurate information of the amount or whereabouts of such internationally owned securities, and less knowledge of the psychology of the owners of such obligations. That is to say, we do not know what motives may move them to return securities to the markets of the countries in which they originate.

If a central bank has foreign deposits which may be withdrawn, it knows something in regard to the amount of gold which it must hold free as a reserve against those deposits. But such a central bank never knows what demands may fall upon it resulting from the return to its national markets of securities held by foreign investors. The close margin by which we came near going off the gold basis in June 1932, was largely the result of foreign holders of American securities throwing those obligations onto our market.

FLIGHTS OF CAPITAL

Another even more incalculable factor has arisen from the growing practice of central banks keeping deposits in other central banks. In doing that, they have pyramided the obligation on identical masses of gold. The gold is first held as a reserve against obligations of the central bank which has the actual gold in its vaults. If its deposits include balances of other banks, the same gold may be counted as a reserve against the obligation of those foreign banks.

Another incalculable strain has been put upon gold by the amount of liquid capital belonging to timid, shrewd individuals which is moved from one country to another seeking economic safety. If an individual exports liquid capital from one country to another, the effect upon the exchanges is the same as if goods had been exported, but in the operation there is no relation to the movement of goods. A flight of capital, motivated by fear, could push a country off the gold basis even while its export of commodities still left it with a favorable trade balance.

This freedom in the movement of timid liquid capital, together with the incalculable movement of internationally owned securities—neither of these movements being related to the balance of trade resulting from a country's normal imports and exports—has brought into the management of the gold standard forces which are comparatively new in finance. It should be noted that the debts growing out of the war, and having no relation to current trade movements, are a part of those new forces.

The operation of all the obligations which have been heaped upon the gold standard has caused one country after another to abandon it, until there are only six countries that can, even by a stretch of the imagination, be considered on a gold basis—France, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, Italy, and Poland. Even they are only nominally on a free gold standard, all having one form or another of restriction, none permitting the use of gold in general circulation and none offering completely free exchange of currency for gold. After it was declared criminal, in the United States, to hold gold and after regulations prohibiting its export except under license, we still nominally claimed to be on a gold basis, until the license restrictions were so sharply defined in April as to make such claim absurd. Nearly all countries that have abandoned the gold standard, and part of those that are nominally left on it, have already devaluated their currency. That is to say, they have reduced the amount of gold represented by the unit of their national currency.

PERHAPS AN EINSTEIN NEEDED

France has about a quarter of all the monetary gold in the world—a store second only to our own. But a French franc now represents about one fifth as much gold as it did before the franc was devaluated. Belgium reduced the value of her standard even lower than did France; Italy not quite so low. It has been the common course since more than 30 nations went off the gold standard ultimately to change the amount of gold which each currency nominally represents.

Orthodox thinking about money and prices is shackled by superstition, by long usage and practices, by both national and individual selfishness, by the wholesome fear of change. Few of the orthodox thinkers have either the breadth of technical expertise or the scientific habit of mind that will permit them to take a fresh and clear view. Not many heads of great banks have a contemplative mental habit. If they did, they would not be the heads of great banks. It is expecting too much to hope that there will come from the overburdened brains of practical bankers a vision of the true functions of gold and of money. It is like expecting the high priests of a superstition-filled religion to reform its theology. Anything that the orthodox financiers agree is radical thinking quickly wilts in the atmosphere of the banking room. There might come forth a Martin Luther banker, but he would find it very difficult to nail his deft to the bronze doors of the banking cathedral.

Even that does not make me hopeless that we may come to a better understanding of gold and all that hinges upon it. In the past 30 years we have seen the basis of our fundamental conception of physics, of our understanding of the very nature of matter, undergo profound change. Perhaps we need an Einstein who will develop a theory of economic relativity. It is certainly true that it would be more useful to evolve an exact, understandable, convincing formula covering all the functions of gold, than it would be to discover how to make the alchemists' dream come true.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that there are a number of important committee meetings to be held in the morning. I, therefore, move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 8 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, May 25, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MAY 24, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou to whom we turn as our loving Heavenly Father, accept our praise and our gratitude for Thy loving providence at the beginning of another day. We pray for that understanding, for that vigor of thought, and for that conviction that shall be ours as we meet the challenge of the problems of this day. Strengthen us, our Heavenly Father, so that we shall be altogether adequate to approach every question. We thank Thee for life, for its visions, for its privileges, and for its possibilities. O urge us to grasp it with energy that fires and with wills that flame. Gracious God, may we share Thy thoughts, and let Thy sense of justice and goodness possess us. Each day may our lives be of some real service to the world, made so by the spirit of Him who was earth's humblest servant, man's greatest friend, and Master of all. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

PERMANENT REHABILITATION OF THE AMERICAN VETERANS

Mrs. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the lady from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mrs. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time to invite the attention of the House of Representatives to the present status of the American veteran. And in doing so, perhaps a woman's viewpoint might be helpful.

At 12 o'clock noon on Saturday, May 13, a group of veterans from the State of Indiana visited my office and appealed to me to assist them in a predicament they were in.

They came to Washington to attend the 1933 bonus encampment which was arranged by veterans. A committee had been organized, known as the "Liaison Committee of the Rank and File." This committee was in charge of the registration of veterans who were to be the guests of the Government at Camp Fort Hunt through governmental facilities provided at the request of President Roosevelt.

The veterans, upon arriving in Washington, learned that certain members of the committee in charge of affairs at Fort Hunt were acknowledged Communists. The veterans refused to recognize a committee whose membership contained Communists, and they had spent several days and nights trying to cause the removal of the Communists from the committee, without success. They advised that the objective of communism is contrary to all established principles upon which the Government of the United States was founded.

They preferred to endure the hardships of going without food or shelter rather than surrender their ideals of protection of the principles of our American Government. They presented a petition to me, signed by over 200 men, a number of them being honor-medal men.

I then personally visited the veterans at Seaton Park. A group numbering approximately 500 men were assembled there without food, shelter, or sanitary accommodations. The ground was wet and soggy and a misting rain was falling, and the men were in a very deplorable condition and were subject to the dangers incident to exposure to the elements.

I immediately conferred with the White House, the Metropolitan Police, and the Veterans' Administration officers, and after much effort was able to secure the whole-hearted cooperation of all concerned, and an order was issued at 7 p.m. to permit the men to enter Fort Hunt on an independent basis, unattached to the liaison committee. I personally addressed the men in Seaton Park and urged them to go immediately to Fort Hunt and cooperate with the officials there. Their compliance with my suggestion made me very happy, because I knew they would be protected from the elements and would find good food awaiting them, and that was my immediate concern. I desire at this time to pay tribute to them for their steadfast adherence to their patriotic ideals in face of the hunger and suffering they were enduring. Several of the men were accompanied by women members of their families, and the women were adequately provided for through arrangements made by the Metropolitan Police.

On Sunday I visited the men at Fort Hunt, and they advised me they appreciated and were grateful to President Roosevelt for his consideration and interest. They also advised me they would follow the President's suggestions. This, I am happy to report to the House of Representatives, they did in every instance.

In the face of spoken and printed propaganda circulated by the Communists deriding the efforts of the President and the Congress and in opposition to the vote of the majority of the convention these veterans gratefully accepted President Roosevelt's offer of temporary relief in the reforestation work, and their patriotic and loyal action soon won followers from the left wing of the encampment, so that when Camp Fort Hunt was closed as a bonus encampment the change was made in a dignified American manner, creditable to the President and the veterans alike.

During the progress of the convention the right wing felt they could not agree with the conclusions of the convention and desired to present their petition to the President in person. They asked my assistance in arranging an appointment, which I made, and the veterans were pleased with the cordial reception accorded them.

I have today received a communication from the leaders of that group of the 1933 bonus encampment which opposed the attempt to mix communism with veteran affairs. It is this group who approved the President's suggestions with reference to the veterans accepting temporary assistance in the reforestation camps.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 22, 1933.

Mrs. VIRGINIA E. JENCKES,

Member of Congress, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MRS. JENCKES: Now that the 1933 bonus encampment at Fort Hunt has passed into pleasant memories of the American veterans, it is proper and fitting that an expression from the right wing of the 1933 bonus encampment should be made in order to truthfully and authoritatively state the position of those veterans who desired to petition their President and their Government who believe in the American Constitution and who are opposed to the affiliation of the Communist Party in American veteran affairs. With this thought in mind, we, the committee, who have cooperated with you and other governmental officials, desire to make this official statement, and we respectfully request you to transmit same to the Congress:

(1) We affirm our allegiance to our Government and we will support its institutions.

(2) While we are suffering destitution and privations, we place the security of our Government above our own needs and requirements, and we hereby plead with our President and the Congress as a first step toward a permanent rehabilitation of the American veterans to take such steps as are necessary to prevent the inroads of communism in the affairs of our veterans, our Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, as well as governmental employees.

(3) It is our very sincere belief that permanent rehabilitation of the American veteran can be best accomplished by the immediate payment, all or in part, of the adjusted-service certificates, the immediate care and hospitalization of those veterans who are physically incapacitated, the adoption of such laws or regulations which would permit or require the employment of veterans in industry under control of the Government or Federal employment.

(4) Having complete faith in our President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who served with us in the World War, we petition his thought and consideration for our urgent needs and necessities with the hope that, in the plans for the rehabilitation of the Nation from the depression, will be included a comprehensive and just plan for the rehabilitation of the destitute and incapacitated veteran on a permanent basis.

We respectfully submit this appeal with the hope that we may be accorded consideration promptly.

VETERANS' CONVENTION, RIGHT WING,
Composed of Delegates from All Veterans Organizations.
Mike Thomas, chairman; Albert Wood, John H. Newlin,
Robert Dessoff, C. A. Titterington, E. B. McDade, John
P. Dear, Guy Williams.

Now, my colleagues, you have heard an appeal which certainly deserves the sincere thought of all of us who are interested in all phases of our Nation's rehabilitation.

The permanent rehabilitation of our veterans and their restoration to their place in American citizenship should be and must be a very definite part of our national effort toward bringing prosperity back to the American people.

We have given the President of the United States wide authority and power to do any and all things necessary to face our Nation toward prosperity. And we are proud of his masterful leadership which has already recorded benefits for the people. And I ask you, my colleagues, is it not important to again invest our President with wide authority to do any or all things necessary to restore our veterans to their place in our American citizenship?

We all, especially we women, remember how we sent our soldier boys away to war, with the anxious hours and the scanning of the casualty lists, the relief when the names we loved were not there, and the distress of all those days of uncertainty. They went forth and rendered an everlasting service to their Nation and the world. But what did they come back to? The annual blooming of the poppies asks us that question each year. The rows and rows of white crosses over in Arlington ask us the same question. And the American women are trying to find the answer. And I believe if the Congress will again express its confidence in Franklin Delano Roosevelt and confer the necessary authority and power to act upon him, he will assume this added burden of solving the problems of the American veteran. The veterans have faith in him. He was their comrade during the World War. They recognize him now as their Commander in Chief. They will follow him. His solicitation for their welfare is demonstrated by a comparison of the way the 1932 and 1933 bonus delegations were received here in Washington. So, before our House of Representatives takes any action, let us confer with the President and offer him our support and cooperation in any or all plans which he might now have, or will have, in the immediate future for the permanent relief of the American veteran. I therefore suggest that a motion to appoint a committee to wait on the President for this purpose be made, and that the committee cooperate with the President in an effort to develop the permanent rehabilitation of the American veteran along with and as a part of the Nation's recovery.

If this can be accomplished, we will provide a patriotic inspiration for oncoming generations of defenders of our American homes. [Applause.]

OUR MERCHANT MARINE AND THE OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statistical synopsis on the subject of our merchant marine and the ocean mail contracts as a supplement to the speech I made on this subject in the House on Wednesday, May 10:

I. THE UNITED STATES AS A MARITIME NATION

A. Out of the 11 first acts of Congress, 5 related to shipping. In 1796 American ships carried 92 percent of our trade. Between 1820 and 1860 we were supreme on the sea, carrying 77 percent of our trade.

B. Civil War and westward expansion caused a decline in American shipping. American standards of living and higher costs put us at a disadvantage. Sectional politics killed attempts at adequate subsidies for merchant marine. Deficiency of ships for auxiliary service shown in Spanish-American War. Deficiency again demonstrated in world cruise of White Squadron, 1908. During decade before World War we carried only 10 percent of our foreign trade.

II. THE ECONOMIC IMPORTANCE OF AN ADEQUATE MERCHANT MARINE

A. Our exportable surplus:

1. We have the largest exportable surplus in the world—$4,809,000,000 (1927).

2. National economy requires that 10 percent of our production be sold abroad.

3. Employment curve closely follows foreign-trade curve for this reason.

4. Economic self-sufficiency a myth; general prosperity depends upon foreign trade.

B. Relation of merchant marine to export trade:

1. Ships our best salesmen; will carry our trade and find new markets.

2. Foreign ships will favor foreign goods in competition with ours.

3. Establishment of new lines to new ports will develop fresh markets.

4. Following table demonstrates these propositions—comparison of merchant marine in 1914 with 1927, showing increased sales:

Trade	Number of ships engaged in—		Volume of commerce with—
	1914	1927	1914	1927
Africa.....	None	19	$47,000,000	$200,000,000
South America.....	5	89	347,000,000	1,000,000,000
Orient-Pacific coast.....	5	140	380,000,000	1,800,000,000

Percent of increase in trade between 1914 and 1927: Africa, 325 percent; South America, 190 percent; Orient-Pacific coast, 380 percent.

5. By having a merchant marine we are enabled to participate in international steamship conferences and thus to influence freight rates and eliminate discrimination.

C. Dependence upon foreign carriers puts us at mercy of events beyond our control:

1. If dependent, withdrawal of foreign carriers forces economic isolation on us.

2. Example of effects of foreign war, showing rise in freight rates:

At outbreak of World War, freight rates on American goods rose as follows: Cotton, per hundredweight, from 35 cents to $11; flour, per hundredweight, from 10 cents to $1; wheat, per bushel, from 8 cents to $1.36. General average: tenfold increase.

This resulted in a paralysis of our commerce, at disastrous loss, because we had no ships to handle it.

III. INCREASE OF AMERICAN SHIPPING DURING AND SINCE THE WORLD WAR

A. At outbreak of war we had only 19 ships in overseas trade.

B. War needs required unprecedented building program.

1. Increase from 22 shipyards employing 50,000 men to 212 shipyards employing 350,000 men. Of these 76 built steel vessels.

2. War shipbuilding program produced 2,300 vessels of 9,400,000 tons total.

Ships otherwise acquired raised this to 2,500 vessels of 10,250,000 tons.

3. Cost of this construction was $3,500,000,000—an extravagant sum to meet our deficiency in merchant shipping.

C. Comparison of our 1914 merchant marine with that in 1932:

Trade route	Number of vessels		Gross tonnage
	1914	1932	1914	1932
United States-Europe.....	6	193	69,212	1,194,159
South America.....	4	169	24,011	403,341
Pacific coast-Far East.....	6	87	75,615	706,103
United States-Africa.....	None	20		113,417
Pacific coast-Australasia.....	3	19	18,495	117,576
Total overseas.....	19	388	187,333	2,534,595
Nearby, Caribbean, West Indies, Canada.....	66	164	322,938	747,427
Grand total.....	85	552	510,271	3,282,022

2. During 1921-30 our ships carried 900,000,000 tons of overseas commerce, valued at $74,000,000,000, a substantial part of our national income. This, had we not had the means of selling abroad, would have been a loss to the producers of this country.

3. During this same period our merchant marine derived $3,000,000,000 in revenues from passenger and freight traffic.

4. Had we then remained at the pre-war level of our carrying trade, 10 percent of our commerce, we would have lost in shipping revenue the difference between $3,000,000,000 and $900,000,000, or $2,100,000,000.

5. Regular services were established between 60 American ports and 550 foreign.

D. In spite of this increase in our American-borne trade since 1914, we still carry a smaller proportion of our water-borne commerce than any other western nation, including Greece. Yet our own trade is so profitable that 42 nations have entered their ships to compete for it.

IV. OUR MERCHANT MARINE REQUIRES A SUBSIDY IN ORDER TO SURVIVE

A. Subsidies must not be considered as economic paternalism toward an unjustifiable phase of economic activity. The benefits to be derived from an adequate merchant marine are disproportionately in excess of the cost of compensating for higher American costs in construction, fixed charges, wages, and subsistence of crews. (See VI-E.)

B. A large measure of Great Britain's wealth was derived from the trade carried in her ships. Before the World War she dominated ocean trade, as follows: British shipping carried 52 percent of total sea-borne commerce, 92 percent of her empire trade, 63 percent of the trade between the Empire and others, 30 percent of the trade between foreign countries. Thus she gained huge revenues from the interchange between the other nations. Today England carries 60 percent of her trade, 45 percent of world trade, 30 percent of our trade.

The United States carries 30.5 percent of our trade, 3.4 percent of world trade.

Reasons assigned to Britain's shipping success are these: (a) A strong industrial position with access to raw materials; (b) a far-flung empire with coaling stations and seaports; (c) large coal exports compensating for return loads of goods for consumption; (d) governmental support of shipping in the knowledge of its national value.

C. The increase in our foreign shipping from the World War until 1932 (indicated in sec. III) was not an uninterrupted growth. It commenced with the war, slumped seriously, and was revived by the Merchant Marine Act of 1928, affording reasonable subsidies to compensate for the differentials in American shipping costs.

1. After the stimulus of the war years and until the Merchant Marine Act of 1928 American commerce in American ships declined as follows:

Our foreign trade in American vessels:	Percent
1921.....	51
1925.....	44
1926.....	34

2. During this period no new American ships were placed in our overseas trade, while 800 foreign ships entered it, increasing their proportion of the trade to and from 47 of our 59 principal ports.

3. By March 1928 of our 212 war-time shipyards only 12 were left, chiefly inactive, and in that year they only produced 2 percent of the years' new tonnage. During 1921-27 we built only 2 out of 307 modern motor ships, and only 40 vessels out of a world total of 1,039 of over 4,500-ton vessels, totaling 7,900,000 gross tons.

Over 200 major industries have a direct interest in shipbuilding (90 percent of cost of a ship goes to labor).

D. The revival created by the Merchant Marine Act, granting postal payment and construction loans at low interest.

Under the provisions of this act, 43 contracts were made for the construction of 54 vessels, the conditional building of 12 more, and the reconditioning of 58 others. It is estimated that this program provided employment for 40,000 men.

V. BENEFITS TO NATION ACCRUING FROM SUBSIDIES DISPROPORTIONATELY LARGE

A. The difference between revenues from carrying 10 percent of our water-borne commerce, as in 1914, and carrying one third of it amounted to $2,100,000,000. (See III-C-4.) This amount was added to our invisible trade balance.

B. This direct annual saving of national income amounted to 10 times the cost of the 1928 legislation.

C. The average annual operating loss of the Fleet Corporation was cut from $40,431,000 during 1921-26 to $6,346,000 in 1931, or a saving of $34,000,000—twice the cost of the merchant marine legislation in 1931.

D. Capital expenditures for replacement during the next 10 years would have been $500,000,000. This otherwise public liability has been transferred to private concerns. By January 1941, 500 out of 553 ships would have passed the 20-year age of usefulness and would have required scrapping.

E. Withdrawal of postal subsidies would have forced us back to Government operation of the merchant marine at great operating losses.

F. Upon all loans authorized for construction under the 1928 act, totaling $148,000,000, an effective rate of 4 percent interest has been received, and the benefits of this have cost the Government nothing. (Under the 1931 amendment no loans were to be made at less than 3½, and prior to that only 12 loans had been made at less than 3 percent.)

G. (a) Britain has Government loans outstanding of $472,000,000 for shipbuilding.

(b) Less tangible, but still more important, has been the development by American shipping of great new markets for our exports. (See II-B-4.) This means a valuable investment in the future of our trade. But if our vessels were to be withdrawn from this trade, foreign commerce would be certain to take over these outlets for surplus.

VI. MISLEADING PROPAGANDA THAT WE ARE UNECONOMICALLY OVERBUILDING FOR UNPROFITABLE TRADE

A. Source of propaganda: Nations that are outbuilding us to get this trade.

1. Great Britain, outbuilding us 9 to 1 in tonnage; 13 to 1 in number of ships.

2. In all, 42 nations placed, 1921-27, 800 new ships in our trade, to our none.

B. American foreign trade most profitable in world.

1. Largest exportable surplus—$4,809,000,000.

2. During 1921-30, passenger and freight revenues in our trade totaled $9,000,000,000; $6,000,000,000 of this to foreign shipping; only $3,000,000,000 to ours.

C. Is foreign competitive building economical?

1. It is acknowledged that ships of more than 25,000 gross tons and of 21 or more knots are uneconomical; fixed charges and operating costs exceed possible revenues.

2. Four foreign nations have placed 18 vessels exceeding both these tonnage and speed limits in trade since 1926; 9 of these exceed 40,000 tons. They are: Great Britain 5, totaling 196,082 tons; France 5, of 207,755 tons; Italy 5, aggregating 189,493 tons; Germany 3 ships with tonnage of 128,963. Recent foreign ships of these classes total 722,293 tons.

D. Have we similarly built, as charged, uneconomically?

No. During this period we have not launched a single ship exceeding these speed and size profitable limits.

E. The United States must build to overcome an overwhelming inferiority in tonnage.

1. We carry smaller proportion of our export trade than any other western nation, including even Greece and Japan.

During 1922-31, 42 nations participated in our foreign trade in the following proportions, excluding tankers:

	Imports, tons	Percent	Exports, tons	Percent	Imports and exports, tons	Percent
American vessels...	75,728,000	31.0	95,977,000	30.1	171,705,000	30.5
British carried.....	70,141,000	28.8	98,630,000	31.0	168,771,000	30.0
Others carried.....	98,140,000	40.2	123,865,000	38.9	222,005,000	39.5
Total.....	244,009,000		318,472,000		562,481,000

2. Compared with Great Britain, our ocean-going tonnage is only one half as great. Our tonnage in foreign trade is only one sixth as great as England's.

Further, in sea-going ships of 12 knots or more we have 180, Great Britain 1,034; of 16 knots or more we have 37, Great Britain 158; of 18 knots or more, we have 12, Great Britain, 37; of 20 knots or more we have 5, Great Britain 16.

3. Of the six great maritime powers we are at a great disadvantage either as to actual tonnage, speed within economical limits, or approaching obsolescence.

Taking totals and averages for the six maritime powers, vessels of 2,000 tons or more:

We own 15.5 percent of 10,008,837 tons passenger and freight vessels; 32.5 percent under 10 years; average of all countries, 41.7 percent.

We own 22.2 percent of 23,687,600 tons freight ships; 1.1 percent under 10 years; average of all countries, 25.8 percent.

We own 42.5 percent of 5,753,976 tons tankers; 11.3 percent under 10 years; average of all countries, 33.6 percent.

Break-down by nations, all types of ships

Country	Gross tons	Percent owned by each country	Percent under 10 years old	Percent of tonnage, speed 12 or more knots
United States.....	9,252,300	23.5	9.1	28.4
Great Britain.....	17,882,581	45.3	42.6	56.0
Japan.....	3,257,346	8.3	21.3	49.6
Germany.....	3,291,141	8.3	42.8	65.2
Italy.....	2,852,989	7.2	28.4	44.9
France.....	2,914,176	7.4	29.2	57.4
Total and average.....	39,450,413	100.0	31.0	49.1

¹ Only 3,282,000 tons of this in foreign trade, exclusive of tankers.

These tables show a disproportionately small tonnage in each class but tankers, a tremendous inferiority as to speed, and a rate of obsolescence more than three times the average.

F. We are not building to compensate this deficiency and approaching retirement.

In past decade these six nations built vessels of 15,000 tons or more as follows:

	Number of vessels	Gross tons
United States.....	11	226,071
Great Britain.....	49	1,036,216
Japan.....	3	51,448
France.....	10	288,845
Italy.....	12	344,340
Germany.....	10	262,911
Total.....	95	2,209,831

In other words, far from overbuilding in relation to other nations, we are building less in proportion to our trade needs and to our inferiority.

G. While the other great powers are adding new tonnage we are scrapping or laying up greatest amount of obsolescent ships without replacement, as follows: 1922-31:

Country	Tonnage scrapped	Tonnage laid up
United States.....	12,560,000	3,588,000
British Empire.....	2,388,000	3,340,000
Italy.....	855,000	619,000
France.....	773,000	931,000
Japan.....	215,000	256,000
Germany.....	147,000	1,103,000
Others.....	592,000	2,863,000

¹ 700,000 more tons to be scrapped, making 3,260,000.

World surplus tonnage, about 14,000 tons.

About 14,000,000 tons are over 20 years old.

United States has practically no tonnage over 20 years old. (The Leviathan was built in 1913.)

Most of old obsolete tonnage sold by Great Britain at low prices to lesser nations.

H. Motives for propaganda against American construction while other nations build excess of uneconomical ships:

1. At Washington arms conference, 1922, we agreed to surrender our naval supremacy in capital ships and scrapped 850,000 tons building or completed. Ratios accepted impliedly extended to other naval vessels. Competition for naval supremacy therefore transferred to merchant tonnage suitable for auxiliary service. World War proved value of convertible cruisers.

2. Economical vessels suitable for profitable ocean trade not suitable for high-speed war use. Tendency, therefore, to build large, fast, unprofitable ships with heavy Government subsidy. (This is a century-old policy of European governments. Some of the great merchant vessels of privately owned lines have been built with postal subsidies and low-interest construction loans from governments, vid. Mauretania and Lusitania.)

3. Expense of these auxiliary merchantmen greatly reduced if they can find and keep profitable trade. Bulk of such trade lies in American commerce.

4. Thus, after we have sacrificed our naval supremacy, concealed foreign navies are competitively built and supported at our expense.

5. Were the United States, by economical and profitable expansion of her merchant marine, to regain and to hold a respectable share of her carrying trade, her foreign commerce would no longer be taxed for the support of foreign navies.

6. Hence it follows that other maritime powers will exert every influence to discourage the support of an American merchant marine.

J. Accused of overbuilding, we are outbuilt by foreign powers which propose to achieve naval expansion at the expense of our foreign commerce. But by equipping ourselves to carry a legitimate share of our trade we may assure ourselves of the old and new markets that will absorb the exportable surplus upon which the health of our national economy must rest.

VII. A MERCHANT MARINE ADEQUATE TO OUR TRADE NEEDS WILL ALSO, WITHOUT HIGH COST, SERVE NATIONAL DEFENSE

A. Our foreign policy is based upon disarmament, and our domestic policy has prevented building our Navy even up to treaty strength. One billion dollars would now be required even for this.

B. In merchant vessels capable of conversion for naval use and having a speed of 15 knots or better we had (in 1928) only 70 inferior vessels, as compared with 227 superior vessels of this type owned by Great Britain and as compared with a great superiority of the other naval powers.

Under the Merchant Marine Act of 1928 we may build such a fleet of convertible merchant ships at small cost to the Government and to the great advantage of our foreign commerce.

C. Overseas communication in war time is as important as overland railways. It is proven (sec. II-C-2) that dependence upon foreign merchantmen is ruinous in time of crisis. An adequate merchant marine is therefore essential to our national safety (Boer War; Spanish War; English coal strike, 1926; World War).

D. The Merchant Marine Act of 1928 provides for national defense under the following terms imposed upon vessels built under its provisions:

1. They must be built in accordance with naval specification.

2. They must remain under the American flag during 20 years (their useful life).

3. They must be of the most modern design, with the most economical machinery.

4. No damages shall be collectible as the result of their requisition for war.

5. Two thirds of their crews and all of their officers must be American citizens. This means the creation of a trained nucleus available for naval duties in war time.

E. The construction of an adequate number of merchant vessels will keep open shipyards, manned by skilled labor, available in a national emergency. It will be a great aid to the unemployment problem. More ships are needed to adequately care for our foreign trade.

THIRD DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1933

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 5390) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

On no. 4: Makes not to exceed $400,000 of the working capital of the Government Printing Office for the fiscal year 1934 available, as proposed by the Senate, to enable the Public Printer to comply with the provisions of law granting 15 days' annual leave of absence with pay to employees.

On nos. 5 and 6, relating to the Bureau of Indian Affairs: Appropriates $10,000 from the funds of the Indians of the Truxton Canyon Reservation, Ariz., to be expended in the eradication of scabies in livestock; and continues available during the fiscal year 1934 the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for the fiscal year 1933 from tribal funds for attorneys' fees and expenses for the Menominee Tribe of Indians of Wisconsin.

On no. 13: Continues available for the fiscal year 1934, as proposed by the Senate, the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the fiscal year 1933 for flood protection of the Palo Verde Valley, Calif., and transfers the item to the appropriate place in the bill.

On nos. 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22, relating to judgments of United States courts: Appropriates for the payment of judgments rendered against the United States and certified to Congress for appropriation after the bill had passed the House. earthquake during the year 1933. This amendment proposes to extend the scope of the authority to include buildings damaged by "tornado or cyclone" without increasing the total amount of loans authorized by the paragraph.

J. P. BUCHANAN,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
W. A. AYRES,
JOHN TABER,
ROBERT L. BACON,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, if you will give me your attention for a minute I will render you an accounting of the stewardship of the conferees on the part of the House.

This bill, as it passed the House, carried a total appropriation of $45,891.44. As it came back from the Senate it carried a total of $1,004,597.55, or an increase by the Senate of $958,706.11. However, it is only fair to the Senate to state that the large increase in this bill made by that body was caused principally by judgments of the United States courts and the Court of Claims, audited claims allowed by the Comptroller General, and damage claims authorized by law and settled and certified by the heads of departments. Those items aggregate $853,931.

In addition to them, there is an item of $20,000, put on by the Senate to cover expenses of the impeachment trial of Judge Louderback. There are also 15 additional police provided for the Senate Office Building, amounting to $22,275. Maintenance of the Senate Office Building is $5,000. There is a total for the Senate's expenses of $47,275. The other items agreed to by the House are to be met by the use of funds already appropriated. Not to exceed $400,000 of the working capital of the Printing Office is made available to grant 15 days' leave with pay to the employees of that office to which they are entitled under the law and which the employees of all other departments get.

That comprises the Senate items of increase in the bill to which your conferees agreed. There are some that we did not agree to. For instance, we objected to and struck out the appropriation of $10,000 for expenses of delegates to attend the Interparliamentary Union. We thought that was not necessary and that now was not the proper time to spend money for that proposition. The Budget sent up an estimate to permit the use of $1,500,000 of State Department appropriations, to pay the difference in exchange in foreign countries before we went off the gold standard and after we went off the gold standard, to the employees in foreign service and on account of other expenses. That we cut out. The Senate added that amendment, based on the Budget estimate. I can see no reason why this Government should pay employees of the State Department the difference in the value of the American dollar in foreign countries before we went off the gold standard and after we went off the gold standard. If we paid in that Department, why should we not pay the difference in every other department? For instance, the Departments of Agriculture and Commerce, the Coast Guard, the Public Health Service, the Army, Navy, and other agencies have foreign service and foreign service employees. The following table is a list of these services:

Table showing average number of employees of the United States Government in foreign countries and total expenditures for maintaining the principal services during the fiscal year 1933

	Number of employees	Total expenditures
Department of Commerce (Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce).....	178	$1,164,000
Tariff Commission.....	6	29,000
Treasury Department (Bureau of Customs).....	94	376,000
Labor Department (Immigration Service).....	81	223,000
Treasury Department (Public Health Service).....	180	321,000
State Department.....	3,850	9,800,000
War Department.....	70	340,000
Navy Department.....	16	104,000
Agriculture Department.....	68	188,000

¹ Does not include officer or enlisted personnel assigned on foreign station.

Therefore, to make an appropriation for the State Department to pay the difference in the exchange value of the American dollar in foreign countries before and after we went off the gold standard would require us to make appropriations to pay the difference to the employees of every other department. Not only that, but if we paid employees in Foreign Service the difference in the purchasing power of the American dollar before we went off the gold standard and afterward, why should we not pay it to the employees in the United States as well? Therefore when the Senate put on this amendment I called the conferees of the House together, summoned a representative of the State Department, and conducted a hearing. As a result, your conferees were unanimous in turning down that appropriation. [Applause.]

Now, if there are any questions which any gentleman desires to ask about this bill, I shall be glad to try to answer them.

Mr. McFARLANE. I should like to ask the gentleman a question with reference to amendments 8 and 9. I heartily approve of the statements which the gentleman just made regarding amendment no. 10, but I notice under amendments 8 and 9 we are appropriating for Foreign Service officers $80,000; $60,000 under amendment no. 8 and $20,000 under amendment no. 9. I should like an explanation of that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is the usual and customary practice on change of administration. There is a complete set of high officials in our Foreign Service to be appointed by the Democratic administration, to take the place of those now representing us in foreign countries, appointed by the Republican administration.

All these new appointees have to go through several weeks of instruction before they go to their posts to manage the affairs of our country diplomatically, as they call it. As far as I am concerned, I do not believe in diplomacy, I believe in speaking right out in meeting and defining a nation's position, but that is not the practice of the nations of the world. So this money is necessary to pay the salary of the new appointees while they are going through their period of instruction in this country and while they are en route to their foreign posts.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Is there anything in it in the way of additional gratuity to those who will be retiring from the Foreign Service whose positions will be taken by the new appointees? It says something about incidental expenses, office and living quarters in the Foreign Service.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; they just hold on there until the time comes for them to come back.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I should like to have the gentleman's interpretation of the section in reference to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That section will come up for discussion later, and a separate vote will be had upon it. Suppose we defer discussion of the matter until then?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. That is satisfactory.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire any time to explain the conference report?

Mr. TABER. Not at present.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

Senate amendment no. 1, page 2, line 3:

"To pay to Nieves Maria P. C. Walsh, widow of Hon. Thomas J. Walsh, late a Senator from the State of Montana, $9,000.

"To pay Alice C. Howell, widow of Hon. R. B. Howell, late a Senator from the State of Nebraska, $9,000.

"For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, fiscal year 1933, $20,000.

"Police force for Senate Office Building, under the Sergeant at Arms: 15 privates at the rate of $1,620 per annum each, fiscal year 1934, $22,275."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BUCHANAN moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with the following amendment:

"In lieu of the matter inserted by such amendment insert the following:

"SENATE

"To pay to Nieves Maria P. C. Walsh, widow of Hon. Thomas J. Walsh, late a Senator from the State of Montana, $8,500.

"To pay to Alice C. Howell, widow of Hon. R. B. Howell, late a Senator from the State of Nebraska, $8,500.

"Appropriations for the allowance of an amount equal to a year's salary at the rate payable to a Senator or Representative at the time of his death are authorized hereafter only for the following dependents of any Senator or Representative who dies during his term of office: (a) The widow, if such sum is necessary for her support and/or the support and education of her dependent child or children, or, if there be no widow, (b) the dependent child or children (or the legal guardian thereof) if such sum is necessary for the support and education of such child or children. Any appropriations made hereunder shall be disbursed, respectively, by the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives. This paragraph shall not be applicable to any widow who succeeds her husband in Congress. The term "Representative" as used herein includes Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners.

"For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, fiscal year 1933, $20,000.

"Police force for Senate Office Building, under the Sergeant at Arms: 15 privates at the rate of $1,620 per annum each, fiscal year 1934, $22,275."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, if I understood the amendment correctly, I make the point of order against it for the reason that it goes beyond the purview or right of the committee on conference, because it takes into consideration matters that were not in dispute between either House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order a moment? I want to see if I cannot induce him to withdraw it.

Mr. SNELL. I shall be pleased to withhold the point of order to allow the gentleman to explain the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. My amendment only cuts out the abuses in this custom. The gentleman will recall without my mentioning names the case of a Senator who died some years ago who had no wife, who had no dependents, but who had a niece. He was extremely rich and left his niece a million dollars by his will.

In spite of that, under the custom we now have, the Senate allowed a year's salary ($10,000) to that niece out of the Treasury of the United States. This amendment is designed to prevent that sort of abuse.

Again, if a Member dies and his wife is elected to Congress to succeed him, under the present system she gets an allowance of a year's salary and also the pay of her office. This amendment merely cuts out that year's allowance and authorizes these appropriations in future only where they are necessary for the support of dependents. It settles the question forever so it will not be coming up every Congress.

Mr. SNELL. Let me say to the gentleman from Texas that I entirely agree with every statement he has made. Individually, I never was in favor of the whole proposition, and I would be willing to have it cut out.

Mr. BUCHANAN. So would I.

Mr. SNELL. But I believe it should either be cut out entirely or that each Member should be treated exactly alike. I do not think there is any reason for going into the question of whether I have 1 child or 4 children, or whether I leave my widow any property. The question is whether you are going to do it. As a matter of fact, there is nothing in the law that authorizes these appropriations and they are subject to a point of order at any time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I should be pleased to cut out the whole business and should be pleased if another approprition like this never was made. My amendment was only in the interest of economy. In the regular procedure, of course, if the gentleman insists upon his point of order I concede that it is good.

Mr. SNELL. I may say to the gentleman I am just as much for economy as he is and I am willing to vote now to strike it all out, but I am not willing to make flesh of one and fowl of another. I think each Member should be treated exactly like every other Member. That is my position. I will join the gentleman in cutting it out now and in cutting it out for all time if he wants to be a real economist.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will give the gentleman an opportunity to vote that way. I ask the Speaker to rule on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds the proposed amendment carries additional legislation to the Senate amendment, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BUCHANAN moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment no. 1, and agree to the same with the following amendment: In lieu of the matter inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SENATE

"For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, fiscal year 1933, $20,000.

"Police force for Senate Office Building, under the Sergeant at Arms: Fifteen privates at the rate of $1,620 per annum each, fiscal year 1934, $22,275."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a preferential motion.

Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. If this motion to recede and concur is adopted, the language of Senate amendment no. 1, as passed by the Senate, in its entirety would be agreed to, would it not?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. If this motion is carried, does that mean that these widows are given the money carried in the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. For myself I want to protest against this practice, and I should like to have an opportunity of voting against a continuance of the practice of giving widows of Representatives and Senators this money that the widows of no other class of people get.

Mr. SEARS. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] to receive and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 2. Page 2, line 14:

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

"To pay Lois Slayton Woodworth Briggs, widow of Clay Stone Briggs, late a Representative from the State of Texas, $8,500."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BUCHANAN moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment no. 2, and agree to the same with the following amendment: "After the sum '$8,500' add a comma and the following: 'to be disbursed by the Sergeant at Arms of the House.'"

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Woodrum). The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE

"Seventh International Conference of American States, Montevideo, Uruguay: Not to exceed $70,000 of any appropriation made for the Department of State for the fiscal year 1934 is hereby made available for the participation by the United States in the Seventh International Conference of American States to be held in the city of Montevideo, Uruguay, including personal services without reference to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and rent, stenographic reporting and translating services by contract if deemed necessary, without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 41, sec. 5); traveling expenses (and by indirect routes if specifically authorized by the Secretary of State); hire of automobiles; purchase of necessary books and documents; stationery; official cards; newspapers and periodicals; printing and binding; entertainment; equipment; and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, to remain available until June 30, 1934."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the motion to recede and concur in the Senate amendment, as made by my colleague, is a preferential motion and takes precedence of all others. But for this I would move to disagree to this amendment, which seeks to appropriate $70,000 out of the Public Treasury to permit certain officials of the State Department to take a round-about pleasure trip to Montevideo, Uruguay. In my opinion, this is just another junket, pure and simple. This time it is a $70,000 junket. Week before last it was a $250,000 junket proposed by our friend from New York, Dr. SROVICH, which might have cost as much as $500,000, but we defeated that one and killed it by a vote of this House, which saved that money for the people. Last week it was another $250,000 junket that was proposed by our good friend from New York [Mr. CELLER], and the Speaker sustained my point of order against it and we killed it and saved the money in the Treasury. Last Saturday it was a $48,500 junket which our other good friend from New York [Mr. BLOOM] tried to get through, but by a vote of the House we struck out the enacting clause of the bill and killed it and saved that $48,500 for the people.

I know that my good friend and colleague from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], the distinguished chairman of the great Appropriations Committee of this House, is for economy and is against junkets; and it is my belief that he would never agree to this proposal to appropriate this $70,000 were it not for the fact that it was requested by the State Department. There are numerous officials in the State Department who are always wanting to take trips in foreign countries. I wish that all of you knew just how many trips abroad some of them have made, and just how much was spent on such trips. And when officials from these various departments want to go abroad, they find some way of getting their plans approved by the White House. And whenever any Member takes the floor to oppose their plans, he not only has to go up against some committee but some of the department chiefs themselves will try to hamstring him.

I call your attention to what happened on this floor last Saturday, when I made the motion to strike out the enacting clause and kill the bill to spend $48,500 attending an Institute of Agriculture in Rome, Italy. My friend from New York [Mr. BLOOM] read what he claimed was a telephone message which he said had just come from Mr. Carr, Assistant Secretary of the State Department, in which he claimed Mr. Carr said:

If Mr. BLANTON discusses further information received by him from the Department of State about expenditures for the institute, I suggest you request that he read the letter to the House, and any statement that may have accompanied it. In his debate of yesterday he misstated facts that were communicated to him.

I immediately challenged it, and I quote the following colloquy from page 3832 of last Saturday's RECORD, to wit:

Mr. BLANTON. I challenge that purported statement from Mr. Carr, and I challenge any Member here to produce such an assertion signed by him. I know that Mr. Carr would not sign such an assertion. Every quotation I made yesterday from his letter was absolutely correct, and I have his letter here to prove it. I challenge him or anyone else to show any misquotation. He cannot do it to save his life.

Mr. BLOOM. I am only reading the message that Mr. Carr sent.

Mr. BLANTON. You have no such statement signed by Mr. Carr. I challenge you to produce such a one over his signature. Here is the letter from Mr. Carr dated May 17, 1933, and if you will compare it with the quotations I made from it yesterday, now in the RECORD, you will see that I did not misquote him in any particular. He cannot show a single quotation that is incorrect. He cannot do it to save his gizzard. [Laughter.]

As a matter of fact, the following is the only part of Mr. Carr's statement that I had quoted in my speech last Friday, and every word of it had been quoted correctly, and the quotation appears on page 3765 of last Friday's RECORD, as follows, to wit:

Mr. BLANTON. To give you an idea of just how each delegate we send to Europe spends public money that we take from the people back home in taxes, I remember that on May 8, 1928, there was held in Rome, Italy, what the Italian authorities called an International Conference on Literary and Artistic Property. Of course, we had to attend it. There is always somebody who wants to attend. As a United States delegate there was a Mr. Thorvald Solberg, already employed on a salary, and he is an able, capable man, and I have high respect and regard for him, and the following is a correct statement of the expenses of his trip to Rome, which I got direct from the State Department, to wit:

Steamship fare, New York to Cherbourg, and railway fare, Cherbourg to Paris and return	$634.00
Railroad fare, Washington to New York	8.14
Pullman fare, Washington to New York	1.88
Miscellaneous traveling expenses and per diem allowances in Europe	633.39

Total..... 1,277.41

And that $1,277.41 for Mr. Thorvald Solberg's junket abroad was paid out of the Public Treasury with tax money wrung from the pockets of taxpayers whose shoulders are overburdened.

When on Sunday morning in reading the RECORD I found that Mr. BLOOM had published the purported statement from Mr. Carr that was wholly untrue, I immediately wrote to Mr. Carr and enclosed him the RECORD for both Friday and Saturday, and called his attention to the fact that in the matter I had quoted from his letter, every word was quoted correctly, and I requested of Mr. Carr that he correct the erroneous statement attributed to him, and I have received a letter from him acknowledging that I had not misquoted his letter and apologizing for his action. Omitting all of his extended reasons for telephoning the committee, which are not pertinent to the retraction, I read that part of his letter which does retract his unjust assertion, to wit:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 23, 1933.

The Honorable THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: I have your letter of May 21, and I regret more than I can tell you the construction placed upon a telephone message which Mr. BLOOM read to the House on Saturday during the debate upon House Joint Resolution 149. I wish to assure you at the outset that I had no thought whatsoever of alleging that you had misstated the facts which I had communicated to you in my letter of May 18. You made only one quotation from my letter, and that was correct. You have always been entirely fair with me, and I have no reason whatever to presume that you would consciously misstate any fact I might communicate to you. * * * If I was in error in the course I took, I am extremely sorry and apologize. Certainly, I had no intention to doing more than to assist the chairman in getting all the facts clearly before the House.

Very sincerely yours,

WILBUR J. CARR.

The above shows that my confidence in Mr. Carr was not misplaced. I deem him one of the most efficient officials in the service of the Government. You will note his statement—

You made only one quotation from my letter and that was correct.

This shows that a great injustice was done me last Saturday when Mr. BLOOM read into the RECORD a telephone message from Mr. Carr that I had misstated facts, the precise words being—

In his debate of yesterday he misstated facts that were communicated to him—when Mr. Carr himself now frankly admits that I made only one quotation from his letter and that was correct.

But the question now before us is whether we are going to spend $70,000 for a conference at Montevideo, Uruguay. Are we in such splendid financial condition that we have $70,000 cash to throw away on such a conference? Are our people free from burdensome taxes? Have we met all of our financial obligations? Have we plenty of money to spend freely? Are all of our American citizens happy with lucrative jobs? Are all of our disabled American veterans being treated justly and generously? Are they all happy and satisfied? These are questions that have been running through my mind during these closing days of Congress, when so many different kinds of junkets are being almost daily proposed.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry that I have not the time. Otherwise I would gladly yield to my friend.

Our great President just now is using every effort in his power to economize and get this Government back on its feet financially. You have voted to sustain him. You have voted to take away from the disabled soldiers of the World War a part of their compensation that they need and which their wives and little children sadly need for their support. You voted to take away from the Spanish-American veterans a part of their compensation that they need to support their wives and children, when they are disabled and unable to work. We must correct the many injustices which have been done to our veterans before we vote to spend $70,000 on a junket to Montevideo, Uruguay.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, but I have not the time.

Mr. KELLER. We do not know what the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about the unwisdom of these $70,000 junkets. I am trying to stop this proposed spending of $70,000 to attend a conference at Montevideo, Uruguay. In my judgment, it is a $70,000 junket. It is unnecessary. Now, does the gentleman know what the issue is?

Mr. KELLER. No; because the gentleman is talking about something else.

Mr. BLANTON. Incidentally, I have mentioned that we must first correct the great injustices which our Veterans' Administration has done our veterans before we spend $70,000 on a junket to Montevideo, Uruguay. The time has come when we must appeal to the President to adjust these injustices and to right these wrongs, for I know that the President is sympathetic and I have confidence in him.

I hope we will stop this $70,000. The House did not put it in this bill. It could not have been put in the bill here in the House. It would have been subject to a point of order, and I would have made a point of order against it and would have stopped it, but in another body, the Senate can put in all kinds of legislation in an appropriation bill and we cannot stop it. But we can vote it out.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Always to my distinguished chairman.

Mr. BUCHANAN. As a matter of fact, this is a request of the President through the Budget, and, as a matter of fact, it is authorized by treaty between the United States and all the Americas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have been hearing that "treaty" business for nearly 20 years, every time I have tried to stop one of these junkets.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This is the first time the gentlemen has heard it from me, and it is the truth.

Mr. BLANTON. Simply because we have minor treaties authorizing conferences, does not compel us or any other country to spend $70,000 attending a conference. I have been trying to stop these so-called "junket trips" for nearly 20 years and every time the excuse is offered that some little treaty requires it. If there is, we have the right now to stop spending the sum of $70,000 on a junket to Montevideo. All of the South American countries would be glad, for it would save them money they cannot afford to spend.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STUDLEY. The Senate agreed to it.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has not yet found out how they do things over there. Possibly some one Senator put it over.

There is going to be called up here under a special rule today a bill to provide an additional $50,000,000 to be loaned to insurance companies. There was a provision in that bill to not loan any money to any insurance company that paid any of its officials a salary larger than $17,500. But the Committee on Banking and Currency has stricken such limitation from the bill and left it entirely to the discretion of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In such connection I want my colleagues to remember that in 1929 the Equitable Life Insurance Co. paid its president, Mr. T. I. Parkinson, a salary of $75,000, and in 1932 it increased his salary to $100,000 per annum. The Prudential Insurance Co. is paying its president, Mr. E. H. Duffield, an annual salary of $125,000. In 1929 the New York Life Insurance Co. paid its president, Mr. T. A. Buckner, a salary of $100,000 per annum, and in 1932 it increased his salary to $125,000 per annum. The Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York in 1929 paid its president, Mr. David F. Houston, a salary of $100,000 per year, and in 1932 it increased his salary to $125,000 for that year. In 1929 the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. paid its president, Mr. E. F. Ecker, a salary of $175,000, and for the year 1932 it increased his salary to $200,000 per year. A salary of $200,000 per annum is too much; $200,000 per annum is not earned as a salary. It is outrageous; and especially is it outrageous when these companies are coming now to the Government of the United States to get laws passed so they can borrow an additional $50,000,000 so that they can continue to pay such unreasonable and inexcusable salaries.

And when I think of such a situation as the above, and then think what has been brought to light yesterday and today about the house of Morgan, it makes my blood boil to think that disabled American soldiers who brought home victory from France, have been cut off from compensation, and are now suffering because it is claimed we are unable to pay them. It makes my blood boil to think that the Veterans' Administration is now demanding of veterans of the Spanish-American War, 35 years after it is over, that they produce evidence sufficient to prove that their disabilities are of service origin. I have just received a letter from Mr. Charles S. Taylor, rehabilitation officer of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, of Dallas, Tex., in which he says:

In addition to the cases I cited to you in my former letter, I want to refer to you a few more actual battle casualties which came to my attention the past week. Without going into detail any more than to state that these cases were all battle casualties, the following cuts were effected:

$40 cut to $20.
$100 cut to $40.
$34 cut to $8.
$29 cut to $20.
$34 cut to $8.
$50 cut to $20.
$81 cut to $40.
$15 cut to $8.
$50 cut to $20.

This bears out the statement in my last letter that the cases cited were just about the same as is happening to all battle casualties. The new rating schedule is to blame for this and not the President's instructions. While the President's instructions allow $20 extra per month for the loss of a hand, foot, or eye, in making the rating schedule this original $20 was taken into consideration and the degree of disability lowered accordingly. In one of the cases cited above the man has five separate disabilities all due to gunshot wounds received in action. Under the new rating schedule 3 of these show a 25-percent disability, 1 a 15-percent, and 1, 10-percent. The method of combining disabilities under the new rating schedule allows this man a total of $40 for all five of these disabilities.

Does not the above make your blood boil? It does mine. And the following are the headlines in this morning's press:

J. Pierpont Morgan and his 19 multimillionaire partners paid no income taxes whatever to the Government in 1931 and 1932.

And then, the subheadlines:

$21,071,862 written off as losses in 2 days in January 1931.

And then, the following interesting news item in today's paper:

J. P. Morgan testified today that he paid taxes in England in 1931 and 1932, the years in which he paid no income tax in the United States.

They say that Andrew W. Mellon and associates profited about $400,000,000 from the war. They say that because of the war Morgan and his associates increased their holdings about $600,000,000. They say that there are numerous other multimillionaires who increased their holdings a total of several billion dollars because of the war. I am in favor of passing a law that will make each and every one of them dig up these undeserved and unearned profits of the war, and use same to pay the adjusted-compensation certificates which are a debt of honor due our veterans.

We must have a general house-cleaning respecting these Mellons, Mills, Meyers, and Morgans, and take from them the reins of government, and preserve this Republic for the people once more. As Christ whipped the money changers from the temple, we are looking to the President of the United States to keep his pledge, and see to it that every department of this Government is absolutely free of such contaminating influence. I have confidence in the President. You have confidence in him. The people of the United States have confidence in him.

In conclusion, let me state that we should not allow this $70,000 to be spent on this proposed junket to Montevideo. We ought to keep it in the Treasury. We need it for other purposes. It will mean much to the disabled veterans whose compensation the Veterans' Administration is cutting deep and cruelly. I am standing by the President, but I am at the same time doing what I believe he wants to do—seeing that justice is done our soldiers of this Republic.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time is under the control of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I guess I am about as hard-boiled as anybody in the House in regard to spending money. I believe that it will be a great damage to the United States if we are not represented at the Pan American Conference at Montevideo.

The Pan American Union was organized by the governments, with the idea that the American states standing together would create a better feeling.

Now, for us to say that we will not send a delegation there would be ridiculous. It would destroy the good will that we might have with every South American country. It would be absolutely ridiculous for us to say that we would not spend a few thousand dollars which it costs to provide for the American representation at this conference.

Frankly, if it was a matter where we could save money and get along I would be in favor of saving the money. But this is a case where if we spend $70,000 it will return to us many thousandfold in good will that will be created among the different countries.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Does not the gentleman think that we could save this $70,000 and devote it to the hospitals of the country to take care of the sick veterans?

Mr. TABER. We have more hospital facilities now than we need.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I have been reliably informed within the last few days that when the President of the United States invited the diplomats of other countries to call on us during the past 30 days their expenses were paid out of the contingent fund of the State Department.

Mr. TABER. I never heard of it, and I do not see why they should do that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the criticism of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. I am glad to stand here and hear him say that we are going to correct the mistake we made heretofore. I am glad he called attention to the fact. The gentleman from Texas voted for the so-called "economy bill."

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is not with the President.

Mr. KELLER. I am endeavoring to serve the people of my country. I am going to help them if I can. The gentleman from Texas has had a change of heart, I am glad to say.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. I was going to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] when he mentioned the matter and suggested that the time had come for Congress to correct the mistake it had made, how he proposed to correct it.

Mr. BLANTON. We are going to give back a part of the compensation to the veterans.

Mr. MOTT. You cannot do anything now for the veterans, for you have turned it all over to the President of the United States. In order to do anything for the veterans now, you will have to go to the President.

Mr. KELLER. I want to say that I know the difference between good economy and bad economy. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] does not. I think we ought to carry out our contract with the South American states. I do not believe that in the name of economy we should stop all expenditures. That is bad economy, and we ought to carry out our treaty obligations.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman want to speak on the bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of this appropriation. I believe it is a part of wisdom on the part of the United States to enter into these understandings and these meetings with the South American countries. I am fearful, however, that we have lost our great opportunity by not having a closer relationship with these countries, while we have been occupying our time with European troubles and involvements. I think it is well for us at all times to keep a close relationship with peoples of North and South America. Therefore I am heartily in favor of this proposition.

I should like, however, to call the attention of the House to the situation in respect to our further involvements abroad in these conferences. At present we have at Geneva an unofficial ambassador, Mr. Norman H. Davis, who yesterday attempted to speak for the United States and did further involve the United States in a consultative pact. That which Secretary Stimson started to do and failed to do Mr. Davis has done.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am speaking to the question of these conferences.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But this is a particular conference provided in this bill, and the gentleman promised when he took the floor that he would confine his remarks to this matter.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am confining my remarks to the question of these conferences.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Woodrum). The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed to discuss the matter before the House, which is Senate amendment no. 7.

Mr. McFADDEN. If I am deprived of discussing other conferences, then, of course, I shall have to desist.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman yields back the remainder of his time.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I was not permitted to say what I intended to say, under leave which has been granted to extend my remarks, I am taking advantage of it because of what has happened in Washington today. Before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee a preferred list of friends who are permitted to sit in on underwritings and deals of J. P. Morgan & Co. to the advantage of themselves and oftentimes to the detriment of the public was disclosed. Among others the name of Norman H. Davis was listed in this confidential relationship between J. P. Morgan & Co. and this preferred group.

For the past several years I have been calling attention to the work abroad, under four Presidents, of Norman H. Davis, and I have pointed out that in this capacity he was the representative of the international banking group, headed by J. P. Morgan & Co., and that he was not the representative of the American people but the agent of these international banking houses appointed by Presidents. I have pointed out how he has sat in unofficially, and sometimes officially, but always present at these great international conferences which dealt with armistice, war debts, Versailles Treaty, meetings at London, Paris, Geneva, and wherever international meetings involving the United States were held. This disclosure in the Senate Banking and Currency Committee today into the affairs of J. P. Morgan & Co. shows the close relationship that exists between this firm and Mr. Davis.

Yesterday at Geneva Mr. Davis made an announcement to the Disarmament Conference which involves the United States in European affairs to a greater extent than it has ever heretofore been involved, and to this involvement I am free to say that a majority of the people of the United States are opposed.

During the Hoover administration Mr. Davis was supposed to be the personal representative of President Hoover. When the Roosevelt administration came in, and, in fact, prior to March 4, Mr. Davis was called into conferences held by and between Presidents Hoover and Roosevelt.

Wall Street is a very versatile institution. It has in turn promoted wars, railroads, industries, and governments—and it has always made money for itself. Now it is adventuring in a new field. It is seeking new profits under the protection of the dove and the olive branch. Wall Street is about to incorporate the international conference industry.

As a preliminary step in this new program of financial flotation, Wall Street has its attorneys on the ground in the persons of Norman H. Davis and his adviser, Allen W. Dulles, to so organize the conference industry or the peace industry that securities based upon either or both can be sold directly or otherwise to the public. The past history of Wall Street does not encourage any conclusion that an object other than profits can be the impelling force behind its actions.

Sullivan & Cromwell, attorneys at law, have in the course of their practice approved the legal construction of a great many securities which have been sold to the American public. Among the many corporations whose securities they have shaped and recommended for investment have been the Goldman-Sachs structure, sold up to $209 and now quoted at $2; Central States Electric, sold up to $83 and now quoted at $1.50; and North American Co., sold up to $186 and now quoted at $16. An examination into the conduct of the Goldman-Sachs enterprise would disclose dubious operations by J. P. Morgan & Co. and the Goldman-Sachs officials which resulted in huge losses to the investing public and the defrauding of the Government of vast sums which should have been paid as income tax by the insiders.

Sullivan & Cromwell have evidently served their Wall Street clients well, but the cost of that service to the American public has been something that few of us would care to see repeated.

Allen W. Dulles, partner in the law firm of Sullivan & Cromwell, is the legal and economic adviser to Norman H. Davis, who in turn is an unconfirmed but nevertheless active ambassador to the Economic Conference and the Disarmament Conference. Mr. Dulles seems to enjoy the status of an unconfirmed counsel to an unconfirmed ambassador.

These unconfirmed representatives of our interests must have some impelling reason for their expenditure of energy. Since neither this body nor the Senate has given either gentleman any authority to discuss the affairs of the United States with the representatives of foreign nations, they must draw their authority from some other source. In the case of Mr. Dulles, his membership in the firm of Sullivan & Cromwell suggests that the clients of that firm are his inspiration. One may be pardoned for presuming that Wall Street is going into the conference business in a really big way.

The conference industry has been a costly one for the people of the United States—even more costly than the promoted practice of speculating in so-called "securities." In both the inspiration is the same—the profit of someone other than ourselves. The coming conferences are to deal with foreign trade, we are told. For every dollar of merchandise we have exported in the past dozen years we have also exported more than a dollar in American money, money that is never coming back to us.

It is pleaded that foreign trade will restore our prosperity. Foreign trade ruined our prosperity. Our exports came to an end because we could no longer afford to lend to the foreign buyer the money to pay for our goods. The foreigner did not pay the bills for our exported wares; we paid them.

The object of the pending London conference is stated to be the opening of our markets to foreign exporters. The real object—which is not stated—is to discover new means of milking the shrunken resources of the American people into foreign pockets. I would be glad to be told of any international conference in which we have participated in the past 25 years which has brought us anything but disaster.

Peace? Yes; we want peace and the world wants peace; but peace is not born in conferences with war lords.

Speaking of the London Economic Conference, and supplementing what I have said on the floor of the House during the past 2 days, I now want to quote an Associated Press article appearing in the Washington Post this morning under a London headline, May 23:

British financial circles expect currency discussions now pending in Washington to result in a triangular stabilization agreement between the United States, France, and Great Britain. * * *

O. M. W. Sprague, British representative in Washington, is considered here to be the mouthpiece of Montagu Norman, Governor of the Bank of England, in the currency talks. It was recalled that when Mr. Norman went to the United States last year, his efforts at disguise and secrecy failed to save him from publicity and attention.

The New York Times of today says, in speaking of the printed inflation started by Secretary Woodin, under a Washington date line:

Coincidentally Mr. Woodin announced the appointment of Prof. O. M. W. Sprague, hitherto an adviser to the Bank of England, as financial and economic adviser to the United States Government, with the rank of executive assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The query naturally arises, Is Sprague with England or the United States?

The article further states that before these announcements were made Governor Black of the Federal Reserve System conferred with Governor Harrison of the New York Federal Reserve Bank and Gov. Roy A. Young of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston.

Another report indicates that Professor Sprague may be sent to London either as a delegate or as an expert to participate in the London Economic Conference. And, again, whom is Sprague to represent? The Bank of England or the United States Treasury?

It is well for us to understand that during the past 3 years Professor Sprague has been the economic adviser of Montagu Norman, Governor of the Bank of England, and has been advising the operations of the British stabilization fund which is practically the British Treasury, and the operation of this fund has been detrimental to the best interests of the United States in that it has affected the price of the dollar and price levels.

These incidents, together with the fact that if the United States enters this London Economic Conference, it will be almost wholly unprepared to cope with the elements which will be in control, and I am thoroughly convinced that this conference should not be participated in by the United States, as the accomplishments will not be beneficial but, on the contrary, will be detrimental to the best interests of the people of the United States.

May I say that if we must have conferences, if this habit of sitting around tables and talking in whispers has seized upon us with such a grip that the addiction is incurable, let us confer among ourselves upon our own affairs. Perhaps we can find solutions to some of our domestic problems and perhaps by practice we may acquire sufficient skill to take care of ourselves away from home.

Mr. Speaker, these men whose names are discussed as our representatives in the coming conferences will not be representative of our people. They will be representative of the class which has despoiled our people. Can we look to them to guard our interests? They have not guarded us in the past. The pressure of the changing times has led the wolf to pose as a sheep dog—but he is still a wolf. We will receive no benefits until the demands of Wall Street have been satisfied—and when has Wall Street ever been satisfied?

Let us set our own house in order before we undertake to instruct the neighbors in their economic housekeeping.

Is our recurring activity in foreign affairs based upon the Old World political principle that a foreign war is the surest remedy for domestic discontent?

These are not my questions. They are the questions which are in the minds of millions of Americans who at this hour are weighing us in the balance of their opinion. Men and parliaments alike are weighed on the scales of their performance.

Wall Street has been very active in public affairs of late. The public has grown chilly toward what are playfully called "investment" offerings and the one-time important revenue from commissions on the sales of securities has dwindled to only a trickle of the former torrent. But Wall Street is a versatile institution. It adapts itself to the times. When it cannot sell, it buys. When it cannot buy, it borrows. When it cannot borrow, it lends. When it cannot lend, it collects. It always conducts itself so that it makes money.

Legislative action to reduce its profits in any one field has the effect only of forcing it to seek another field; profits always avoid control, because control may operate to restrict profits. From time to time gentlemen from Wall Street come here to tell us that we must not restrict profits.

I have from time to time criticized the course of financial events. On January 14, 1932, I said in the House that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was designed to be an aid to bankers and not to be a remedy for unemployment or a financial relief for the public.

On February 17, 1932, the Interstate Commerce Commission made public a statement from the Missouri Pacific Railroad, which said that J. P. Morgan & Co. had refused to cooperate with the railroad by extending the maturity of one half of a debt to the Morgan house which was to be due on April 1, 1932.

There was some discussion of the fact that the Missouri Pacific Railroad borrowed money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and then turned that money over to J. P. Morgan & Co. in payment of that debt.

On March 31, 1933, the Missouri Pacific Railroad filed a petition in bankruptcy, stating its liabilities at $40,589,330, of which $23,134,800 represented the railroad's debt to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Evidently the railroad borrowed public money to pay its private debts and then went into bankruptcy, leaving the problem of reimbursing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to that latter corporation to solve. The only solution the Reconstruction Finance Corporation can offer is to lay the unsecured portion of the burden on the taxpayers of the country.

Wall Street, in this instance, represented by the House of Morgan, has demonstrated its versatility. It has the money.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has the notes of a bankrupt.

I do not believe that the Congress should expend any part of our scanty public funds for the expenses of Mr. Dulles, Mr. Davis, or any other of the ambassadors of Wall Street in developing the profit possibilities of the conference industry, nor do I believe that the Congress, the Executive, or the country should be bound by the outcome of their maneuvers. I also believe that our domestic troubles will tax our powers to such an extent that we had best refrain from taking on any more of the load of international grief which has already nearly broken our backs.

Further, I believe that the international relations and negotiations of the United States should be conducted by men who have official warrant of authority direct from Congress. We provide liberally for our State Department and our Diplomatic Service. I am unable to see the necessity of also bearing the cost of fruitless European conferences, which to date have accomplished nothing but to add to our troubles.

To send abroad a stream of unofficial, semiofficial, and official delegates, observers, advisers, and experts would seem to be an imputation that our selected ambassadors and other officials of the State Department are not competent to perform their duties—an imputation which appears to be an injustice to those gentlemen and to the executive who selected them.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, the first conference of the "all-Americas", which includes Canada, Mexico, and all of the South American countries, was held in 1889, and was called by Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State. It resulted in great good and tended to bring the nations of all the Americas together in harmony and good will. The next conference was held in the City of Mexico in 1901, the next in 1906, the next in 1910, the next in 1923, and the last one in 1928, and these conferences were held at various places in various countries. At one of these conferences a convention was adopted in which the delegates recommended to their respective nations that these conferences be held every 5 years, to encourage trade relationship, to solve transportation and other problems, and to suggest proper treaties and the settlement of difficulties between the different countries of this hemisphere. This is merely carrying out that treaty formally ratified in every country, that the conference would be held every 5 years. These conferences have resulted in great good, and in consideration of the problems that now confront us all, I think we should stand together.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman say that this proposed conference could or would perform a service that is not now being taken care of by the Pan American Union?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It could and does. They work in perfect harmony with the Pan American Union. In fact, the Governing Board of the Pan American Union is the Board that calls the conference. This same conference has been postponed for 12 months. If we had the right to call it, and I investigated that, I would ask that they postpone this for a year and not call it at the present time, but the power to call it is not vested in this Nation but in the Governing Board of the Pan American Union, and if they call it and hold it, we ought to be represented. Otherwise we will undo all the good that we have done in the past years in bringing the Americas together.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Is the gentleman in a position to say whether or not the countries in South America that are now either in revolution or have had their government overthrown could find delegates to a conference of this kind in proper mind to participate in such a conference?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think when turmoil and dissension are dividing any country in South America that is the time to have a convention to pour oil on the troubled waters.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am in favor of this amendment, but I question the wisdom of the language in lines 5 and 6, which seems to give permission to the delegates to travel by indirect routes. What is the idea of that?

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is the idea of the State Department, and that is one of the provisions that caused this amendment to be brought to the House for a vote, because it is legislation on an appropriation bill. That compelled me to bring it back for a vote. Otherwise I would have agreed to this appropriation in conference.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Cannot the House vote on it now?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Oh, it is such a small matter that it is not worth while sending the matter back to conference. It is not going to amount to anything.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am afraid it opens it up to criticism by our friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that it may prove itself to be a junket.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If you travel the most direct route, you would have to go direct from here to the place where the convention is held. Our delegates may desire to travel through another country and meet that country's delegates and have a preliminary meeting. They could not do that without this authority.

Mr. GRIFFIN. They might go to Geneva, and that would be a junket.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is a great advantage.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. My colleague knows that as my chairman I follow him on practically everything, but the gentleman himself says he would like to put this off for a year if he could. Does not the gentleman from Texas know that if this Congress of the United States would refuse to appropriate this $70,000 there would not be any such conference held this year?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; I do not.

Mr. BLANTON. Other countries would follow suit, and they would save their money and put this off until next year or the year after, and we would save $70,000 for the taxpayers of the United States.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No. The gentleman from Texas does not know it would not be held. Neither does the other gentleman from Texas know it would not be held. If it is not held, the money is not spent, and there is no harm done. If it is held, we are represented there. So what harm can be done?

Mr. BLANTON. But if we appropriate $70,000 the other countries will feel as if they have to do the same thing, when it would be best for all of these countries to save their money this year and not have the conference.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. BACON. I am informed the State Department considers this conference of the utmost importance.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Absolutely, and so does the President of the United States.

Mr. BACON. And I am informed the President of the United States considers it of the utmost importance, and he is very anxious that this conference should be held. In these times of turmoil and trouble, if we can do a little to help the peace and good will of North America, I think we should do it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I am not so very enthusiastic about most international conferences. In fact, I do not look for much good from any of the European international conferences. As I said in the House the other day, we generally get it in the neck. I am afraid in the coming European conference we will lose our shirts, and we may come home like Mr. Gandhi; but this is a different matter. This is a conference with South America. I not only think it is highly important that we should attend and participate but I believe it is for the best interest of our country, particularly in these days when the British Empire is holding imperial trade conferences and giving preferential rates to all parts of its Empire, and France is doing the same thing. I think this Pan American conference would be very helpful. I am going to make this statement, although I am a protective Republican, I always have been, and hope to always continue to be; but I believe if we are going to make any concessions in the way of trade and reduction of tariff rates it ought to be on the American continent. It ought to be toward South America, Canada, and Cuba; and if they can consider matters of this kind before this Pan American conference, I believe it will be for the best interest of all American people on this continent and for all people in our own country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 14. On page 7, beginning in line 7, insert:

"RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

"That paragraph (6) of section 201-(a) of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932 is amended so as to read as follows:

"(6) to make loans to nonprofit corporations, with or without capital stock, organized for the purpose of financing the repair or reconstruction of buildings damaged by earthquake, tornado, or cyclone in the year 1933 and deemed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation economically useful. Obligations accepted hereunder shall be collateralized (a) in the case of loans for the repair or reconstruction of private property, by the obligations of the owner of such property secured by a paramount lien except as to taxes and special assessments on the property repaired or reconstructed, and (b) in the case of municipalities or political subdivisions of States or their public agencies, by an obligation of such municipality, political subdivision, or public agency. The corporation shall not deny an otherwise acceptable application for loans for repair or reconstruction of the buildings of municipalities, political subdivisions, or their public agencies because of constitutional or other legal inhibitions affecting the collateral. The collateral obligations may have maturities not exceeding 10 years. Loans under this paragraph shall be fully and adequately secured. No loan hereunder shall be made after December 31, 1933. The aggregate of the loans made under this paragraph shall not exceed $5,000,000."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BUCHANAN moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with the following amendment: In line 8 of the matter inserted by said amendment, after the word "earthquake", insert the word "fire."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

The motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. BUCHANAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 4 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, this morning's RECORD contains an earnest, forceful, and constructive statement by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] with reference to the Economy Act as it applies to veterans. One statement, or, rather, a quotation in that statement of the gentleman from Texas has aroused my curiosity. That will be found on page 4023 of the RECORD. That statement reads:

There are no funds available to pay return transportation for beneficiaries discharged.

That is, discharged from veterans' hospitals and from soldiers' homes.

I have tried to reconcile that statement that no funds are available to pay return transportation of veterans discharged from soldiers' homes and hospitals, with the statement which appeared in last night's news reports of the payment of return transportation to those who had been in attendance at the bonus convention of the B.E.F.

The article in last night's paper stated that the transportation was being supplied, not out of the fund which would apply as a lien against the bonus of those veterans, the remaining half of which is unpaid, but out of the general funds of the administration. I thought if those funds were available for that purpose, certainly similar funds should be available to pay for the destitute, disabled, sick, and discouraged men who are turned out of these hospitals and homes as a result of the operation of this act.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I am sure the gentleman is correct, because not only do they use those funds for that purpose, but I understand they used those funds to hire the hall here at $300 a day in which to hold the convention, and they paid $1,000 a day to bring truck loads of delegates to the meeting.

Mr. KVALE. I hope the gentleman will have regard for my limited time; I have only 4 minutes.

Mr. FISH. I am asking by what authority of law that was done.

Mr. KVALE. I am coming to that.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. KLEBERG. I have in my hand by coincidence a letter from a veteran evidently completely patriotic and unusually patient despite his plight, on this proposition, which I hope the gentleman will see fit to include in his extension of remarks, if he asks that permission. This letter is in support of your statement.

Mr. KVALE. I appreciate my colleague's interest and cooperation. Will the gentleman make the request or does he want me to make it?

Mr. KLEBERG. I wish the gentleman would make the request, for it is right in line with what the gentleman is now saying.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I so request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Woodrum). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION HOME,
Kansas.

DEAR MR. KLEBERG: You will remember I wrote you some time ago from Corpus Christi, Tex., about getting in a veterans' hospital. The Veterans' Administration sent me here to the soldiers' home, and now, as you know, they are going to turn most of us boys out.

I will have no money to get home and am not able to hitch-hike it home. I would like to know if Congress could fix some way to give us transportation to our homes. There will be hundreds of us out without a place to go, and unable to work.

If I could get back home, I could make it some way. I will thank you very much if you tell me what, if anything, they can do.

Very truly,

BEN H. HENNING.

Mr. KVALE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I went to see the Assistant Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, in charge of finances, and asked him out of what funds this money came and by what authority it was granted for the payment of transportation of the bonus-application delegates, because the papers said that one delegate came at the last moment from Philadelphia, signified his desire to go to Seattle, and without question the fare was paid. Another man was sent to Alaska, according to the same news story.

The Assistant Administrator said that he did not know about it, that he did not understand it, and referred me to General Hines himself, the Administrator.

General Hines told me frankly that he had been ordered by the administration to make these payments, and that they were made after consultation with members of the Appropriations Committee of this body; that he had informal assurance that the independent offices appropriations bill would, when it emerged from conference, carry funds which would supplement the limited funds he had at his disposal for the transfer of patients and veterans from one hospital or home to another.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. TABER. I may say that if I am on that conference I will not agree to this kind of doings.

Mr. KVALE. Then the gentleman will not subscribe to what I am going to say, because I was going to go on and ask the membership of this House who are interested in the groups of veterans being discharged from hospitals and left without transportation, to go to the Members of the House Appropriations Committee, and to confer in addition with Senators upon the Appropriations Committee, to see that if the grant is made for veterans who were in Washington to be transported to their homes funds may also be granted for the veterans who are left now, far away from their homes, as the result of the Economy Act, so that they may be transported to their homes.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I realize that by such a request I am going to embarrass members of the House Appropriations Committee, but my reason for making the request is this: Pending the revision of these veterans' regulations under the application of the Economy Act, the Administrator can go ahead in one instance if he has the informal assurance of the House committee. Now, in the emergency, with the discharged men actually on the street and destitute, he could take similar action if he had similar assurance from the committee that the money would be forthcoming.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman understands, of course, there are hundreds of cases such as those he has spoken of.

Mr. KVALE. Certainly; and the pitiful part of it is that just because they are far enough away so that they are not on the doorsteps of the Members of Congress and of those in positions of executive responsibility, no attention is paid to them. But for those who are in the Nation's Capital funds can be found to transport them away in order that they may not embarrass some of us, at the same time that under the present plan the sick, disabled, discouraged veteran discharged from the hospital or home is left to hitch-hike his way back home, if his impaired strength and health will enable him to do so.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. FISH. Can the gentleman now tell me under what authority of law General Hines took this money and gave it to the veterans?

Mr. KVALE. I am not blaming General Hines for transgressing any authority; I feel he perhaps can show he did and does have the authority.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman will agree that those administering public funds must act under the authority of law.

Mr. KVALE. He acted on the informal assurance that the funds over which he has supervision will be supplemented later on, when the independent offices bill comes out of conference.

Mr. FISH. Who gave that assurance, Congress or some individual Member of Congress?

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman will have to confer with the members of the Appropriations Committee. I do not know.

Mr. FISH. We should like to know who gave that assurance. Does the gentleman know who gave it?

Mr. KVALE. I do not.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. Inasmuch as the precedent has been established, does not the gentleman feel a refund should be made to the soldiers who last year had to borrow the money and give a lien on their certificates?

Mr. KVALE. I do not go quite that far, but I may say this, that I believe 9 out of 10 of the veterans that were sent out of town at the expense of the Government would be unwilling to accept it if they knew the gratuity was given them at the expense of the crippled, diseased, and helpless men who are out on the streets without adequate clothing, with no way to get back to their homes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. TABER. My understanding was that the Appropriations Committee was opposed to paying the expenses of any convention here; that a convention of veterans was not any more entitled to have the Government pay its expenses than the D.A.R., or a group of national feed dealers, or any other group coming here to seek legislation from Congress.

Mr. KVALE. This was an emergency. I cannot quite agree with the gentleman's position.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. By what authority were they fed and housed? Who appropriated the money, or who gave the authority for the use of the money?

Mr. KVALE. As I understand it, that was done out of War Department general funds. Just what the bookkeeping arrangement was, or what the specific order was, I do not know.

Mr. SNELL. By what authority could the War Department feed 500 men, whether they be soldiers or civilians?

Mr. KVALE. The War Department took similar action on a much more limited scale last year with reference to housing and to the purchase of clothing and emergency rations. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. SNELL. I did not know that.

Mr. KVALE. Last year emergency rations were issued.

Mr. SNELL. I am informed they were authorized by Congress to do it at that time.

I should like to have some one from some department of the Government tell me what right any executive officer has to use funds appropriated for one purpose for an entirely different purpose.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman knows that many strange things are being done these days.

Mr. SNELL. I admit that, but I am going to try to find out about this.

Mr. MOTT. If the gentleman will permit, may I suggest to the minority leader that apparently money may be spent by the administration upon the same authority that they withhold other money. A good example of this is the fund appropriated to the States for roadbuilding, which was specifically exempted from being withheld under the Reforestation Act, but which the President, by an informal letter, has been holding up for the last 3 months without any shadow of authority.

Mr. SEGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. SEGER. I read somewhere during the occupation of the bonus army that some of this money came from a fund which was appropriated for French veterans and was not expended for that purpose. Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. KVALE. It was intended to take up that expenditure, and they justified their action here on that basis, stating it had been appropriated and set aside and earmarked, but not used, and hence they felt justified in using it in this emergency.

Let me make a final plea. This is an emergency. We cannot wait for regulations to be revised. These men are on the street and they are destitute. They are not even strong enough to hitch-hike. If there can be latitude in one instance, it must be given in another. I am very sincere about this, and I believe that this purpose can only be accomplished by prevailing upon the House Appropriations Committee to give at least informal assurance to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs so that he can act in the matter at once. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes on veterans' matters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I think the time has come when someone should stand on the floor of this House and voice the suggestion that the regulations promulgated by President Roosevelt and as being administered by the Veterans' Bureau are not in keeping with the message sent to the Congress by the President in which he pledged the Congress and the people that if he were given the power under the economy bill, he would administer it justly and fairly to the veterans, consistent with the ability of the people to pay. I think it is particularly proper that this protest come from one who believed whole-heartedly in that message and who, without hesitation, acted as I did as a member of the Economy Committee. I accepted the President's message in the same spirit of confidence in him that the veterans had in him when they voted for him last November. I think it is also fitting that these remarks should come from one who voted against the bonus last year and one who is now opposed to the immediate cash payment of the bonus. I am such a person. I think the ill-advised demand for a bonus, including 12 years of unaccrued interest, at a time when the country was on its knees did much to bring about the dilemma in which the veterans now find themselves. Here are some of the things which I believe are wrong in the President's regulations and in the administration of them by the Veterans' Bureau.

First, I do not believe that it was the belief of Congress that the President was going to use the power granted by the economy bill to reduce the degree of disability of veterans who incurred disability in line of service.

There might be some justification for the flat 20-percent reduction, as provided in his regulations, in the compensation for war-incurred disability on the theory that the purchasing power of the dollar is greater now than it was at the time the pensions were originally authorized, but there is no justification for reducing the degree of disability. The truth is neither the Congress nor the country was demanding or expecting any percentage reduction in service-connected compensation. If a veteran had a war-incurred disability of a given percentage 1 year ago, he has the same or greater percent of disability now. The reducing of the degree of war-incurred disabilities, as is now going on in the Veterans' Bureau, in my judgment, is indefensible.

At this time I am not ready to lay the criticism at the door of the President, because I realize he is busy; and yet it was the President, not the Budget Director, not the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, who sent the message to the Congress and to the country, and the President must bear this responsibility if he permits this wrong to be perpetrated upon the veterans of this country with war-incurred disabilities. The regulations under which the Veterans' Bureau is now making these changes in veteran benefits are regulations signed and issued by the President. It is no excuse that he permitted a Budget Director and the Administrator of the Veterans' Bureau to prepare these regulations. The President never requested, and Congress never gave any authority, for the Administrator of the Veterans' Bureau or the Budget Director to prepare regulations pertaining to veteran benefits. The President requested that Congress give that authority to him, and it was to him that Congress gave the authority to issue regulations prescribing veteran benefits.

As one who stood for this measure, and who under similar circumstances would do the same thing again, as a veteran, as a Member of Congress, and as a citizen of this country, I protest against the wrong which is being perpetrated on war-disabled veterans and the dependents of war-disabled veterans.

In the case of the Spanish War veterans, the Veterans' Bureau is literally prostituting a provision placed in that bill by the Congress, namely, that the presumption would be that the disabilities of Spanish-American War veterans were incurred in service. There was just reason for this presumption, because the Government did not keep good medical records during the Spanish-American War. The presumption of war-incurred disability, as any lawyer understands the meaning of a presumed disability, finds no place in the administration of this act by the Veterans' Bureau at this time. The burden of proof is still upon the Spanish War veteran under the conduct of the Bureau.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 more minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object so that the time for the question will not be taken out of the gentleman's time. I want to ask my friend from Kansas if he thinks it is possible for the Spanish-American War veterans, 35 years after the war is over, to look up and get proper evidence to prove that their disabilities are service connected?

Mr. McGUGIN. I know it is wholly impossible.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what the Veterans' Administration is trying to require them to do, and as it is impossible for them to get the proof, we ought not to let the Veterans' Administration require it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. The Bureau in doing this is entirely disregarding a mandate from Congress, because we placed a provision in this bill that it should be presumed that their disability was incurred in line of duty, and therefore the burden of proof would be upon the Government and not upon the Spanish War veterans.

Mr. BLANTON. With such presumption in favor of the veteran, unless the Government can prove that it is not a service-connected disability, the Government has no right to change their ratings.

Mr. McGUGIN. Of course not. This is an abuse of power. It is bureaucratic oppression on the part of the Veterans' Bureau to carry on as it has in the case of the Spanish War veterans on the question of whether or not they have service-connected disabilities.

Now, there is another thing I want to touch upon. Under the old law the child of a World War veteran under 18 years of age received a pension. Under the new regulations the late World War veteran's child ceases to receive a pension when that child reaches the age of 16.

The veteran killed on the field of battle, when his son or daughter reaches the age of 16 the pension stops under this new regulation.

That is not Christian; it is not American; it is not common decency. We are not living in such an age.

Sixteen years is not now the age of maturity. The old provision should prevail that pensions do not cease until the child reaches the age of 18 years and not until the age of 21 when it is used for the purpose of an education. To stop these pensions upon the child reaching the age of 16 years, and thereby turning the child out in the world to hustle for himself, is an act on the part of the Government of forcing child labor.

The bill which Congress enacted giving the President the authority which he requested provided that no Spanish War veteran over 62 years of age should be stricken from the pension rolls. The regulations make a mockery of this provision added to the bill by Congress. When Congress required that the Spanish War veterans be left on the pension rolls it meant that Congress intended for these veterans to have a reasonable pension. When Congress was having confidence in the President and leaving much to him, Congress had a right to expect that reasonable consideration would be given to the wishes of Congress that Spanish War veterans be not stricken from the pension rolls. The President's regulations set the pension at $6 a month for those Spanish War veterans who otherwise would be stricken from the rolls except for this age provision made by Congress. I submit that this is not a fair regard for the wishes expressed by Congress in this matter. Setting these pensions at $6 is a dodging of the wishes of Congress rather than exercising a reasonable courteous regard for the wishes of Congress. Placing Spanish War pensions at a minimum of $6 can more properly be termed a spurning of the wishes of Congress and a wrong to the Spanish War veterans.

There may be other injustices in these regulations. I do not claim that this is all. These are the ones which I have particularly in mind at this time. These remarks are at this time primarily a criticism of the President's regulations rather than a criticism of him personally. If he permits these abuses to continue, then, so far as I am concerned, they become equally as much a criticism of the President as they are of his regulations. The President is popular. I want him to succeed. I want him to retain public confidence, not alone for himself but for the good of the country, but no man can be so popular that he has the right to do wrong or permit wrong to be done and expect to escape criticism.

The stability of government demands economy in government. On that score I stand where I have always stood. The veterans must meet their share of this economy. In this spirit there is much economy which must be effected in veteran expenditures, but there is no way to effect such economies as are now being attempted without the Government repudiating an honest debt due to veterans disabled in the defense of their country.

I make this plea hoping in my humble way that it will awaken the conscience of the country and thereby prevent the wrongs which I have here mentioned and which are about to be effected. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made and include therein several excerpts.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, when the message of the President of the United States came to Congress March 10 asking for authority to issue rules and regulations respecting the veterans' payments, and so forth, the Speaker appointed a special committee of five members to consider the resolution and report thereon to the House.

Along with the gentleman from Kansas, I was a member of that committee. I am sorry to see that my friend and colleague on that committee is now weakening on the position that he so courageously and patriotically took on that occasion.

Today I stand where I stood then—willing to trust the good sense and ultimate judgment of the President of the United States insofar as the veterans are concerned.

Gentlemen, let me say this to you: It was contemplated in the beginning that in making regulations of this kind, dealing as they do with hundreds and thousands of cases—not individuals but with classes—it was realized that undoubtedly injustices were going to come in, and discriminations, hardships, just the same as under the old law when men received benefits that no Member of Congress could or would justify.

Now, gentlemen, I repeat what I said when I brought in the independent offices bill. I know there are places in the new regulations where the cut is more drastic than the Administrator of the Veterans' Affairs intended it to be, more drastic than the Director of the Budget intended it to be, more drastic than the President intended it to be.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman say why the President let these drastic cuts be made?

Mr. WOODRUM. Because the regulations had to be put into effect in thousands of cases—not individuals—but after we have made a careful survey and study, the gentleman may rest assured that the administration will in the end do full justice to the veterans. [Applause.]

Mr. MOTT. How can the gentleman say, when you cut a compensation 50 percent, that the cut of 50 percent was greater than the one who cut it intended it to be?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the gentleman's question means. I say that the President issued these regulations, and they are being put into effect. It has now been demonstrated that some of the cuts are very drastic; and I can say with assurance, and the President has himself said to the American people and to the commander of the American Legion when he called on him, that the new regulations and their effect were undergoing a survey and careful study, and as soon as the full effect can be shown, wherever there ought to be revisions in order to do justice to service-connected cases, those changes will be made; and if such changes are not made, Congress always has the right to go back and correct the matter if it wants to do it. But my plea to the Congress—and I beg of you, my Democratic colleagues—in God's name, let us give the President a chance to do the job himself. We gave him the authority; now let us give him the opportunity to go through with the job and do the thing the way it ought to be done.

Mr. MOTT. Does the gentleman believe a system of trial and error is the proper system to arrive at what should be done?

Mr. WOODRUM. No; I do not; and I do not think any such system has been used.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. I am willing to trust the President so far as the President has time to have knowledge of what is being done, but the gentleman knows that the Administrator of the Veterans' Bureau has occupied this same position for more than 10 years, and he is the fellow who made the report, who knew exactly what he was going to do when that bill was brought in, and you cannot deny that he did not know what was going to be put into effect under the rules and regulations prescribed right now.

Mr. WOODRUM. I do deny it, and I think I have as much opportunity to know about it as the gentleman from Illinois. I do deny that they intended some of the cuts that have been made.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman was so courageous in assuming full responsibility for his share in reporting the original act that I think some of us should testify that the gentleman from Virginia had the courage and vision some months ago to see what was coming, and advised quietly that the sensible thing to do might be to accept a flat 10 percent cut in order to avoid the major penalties that have now been inflicted.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. The gentleman gives us his view of what has taken place. If the gentleman will permit, I dissent entirely from the conclusion he reaches on the facts that he has stated, because I think this all comes about from the National Economy League to accomplish a definite and certain cutting out of compensation to veterans without regard to how it is to be done, and they accomplished exactly what the Chamber of Commerce of the United States said should be done, a $400,000,000 cut, and it has made very little difference with them about the merits of the individual cases.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman shows his absolute unfamiliarity with the program of the Economy League.

Mr. BUSBY. But—

Mr. WOODRUM. Oh, I do not yield. Let the gentleman sit down and listen to me for a moment.

Mr. BUSBY. Then, we will have to have a quorum here.

LXXVII—260

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not care. Call for a quorum if you like. The National Economy League did not advocate a cut of service-connected disability compensation. All they advocated was the entire elimination of non-service-connected disability compensation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

PURCHASE BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION OF STOCK OF INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 156, a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 156

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 1094, an act to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY].

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, there is no demand for time on this side of the aisle.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes. This rule provides for the consideration of what is known as "the insurance bill", reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, permitting the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to purchase the preferred stock or capital notes of insurance companies. We are informed that an emergency exists, that the administration desires the passage of this bill to help out in the insurance field. It is a bill somewhat along the line of the bill we passed authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to purchase the preferred stock of banks. Yesterday I placed in the RECORD, on page 4020, a statement of the situation which gives rise to the need for this legislation. The need is not confined to any particular company. It is not confined to any particular city or State. The failures in the insurance world to date have been large and widespread. Many of these insurance companies do business in practically every State in the Union and have hundreds of thousands of policyholders.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. It is generally reported that many of these large insurance companies pay salaries or annuities or grant gratuities to certain individuals in their organization to the extent of as much as $175,000 per year. If that is true, does this bill in any way protect the taxpayers so that those who receive aid from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will not be allowed to dissipate the money that they receive?

Mr. O'CONNOR. As I understand it, it does. The bill as it passed the Senate had a limitation of $17,500 as the salary for any officer in any one of these insurance companies that might borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The amendment put in by the House committee strikes out that specific limitation, but leaves it in the discretion of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as to whether or not the salaries paid are reasonable.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I should like to ask another question.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman is going to ask about the details of the bill, of course that is not within my province as a representative of the Rules Committee.

Mr. McCLINTIC. According to the information I have an insurance company is allowed to carry in its list of assets all unpaid interest and all installment payments that are due and not paid. Is there anything in this bill that would require the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to carefully look into that situation?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have no knowledge of that situation.

Mr. Speaker, in the statement which I inserted in the RECORD I intended to show that this situation of the insurance companies is effected with a public interest. Not only is this true from the standpoint of the great number of policyholders, but I am informed a situation has developed that in the light of the failures to date, American companies in which our people have their money invested are losing the insurance business to England. I cited one instance where an English company was expected to do about $5,000,000 worth in premiums in a given period, and because of the failure of American companies it did in the neighborhood of $23,000,000 worth of business. Mark you, that one of the great American universities has canceled all its policies in American companies and placed them in British companies. Because of the situation of the American companies, with a consequent loss of employment the business is going out of our country, and I believe it is not only effected with a public interest but with a national interest.

If the Government can come to the aid of banks it should come to the aid of these insurance companies which serve the people throughout every part of America.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. I would suggest, if the gentleman will verify the statement just made in regard to the English company, which, I believe, is the Sun Life Insurance Co. of Canada, he will find the statement is wholly incorrect and that that company during the past two years has lost heavily in volume of premiums here and American companies have gained.

Mr. O'CONNOR. My information to the contrary comes from responsible public insurance authorities. That is all I know about it.

Mr. PEYSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. PEYSER. I might state to the gentleman that the situation which is existing today with all insurance companies, declaring a moratorium on loans and surrenders, has not been lifted, and that is due principally to the fact that the smaller companies, who would be benefited under this particular measure, are the ones that have caused this, because in order to be fair to all the moratorium is against even the big companies that do not need that assistance at the present time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, of course, the gentleman knows much more about the insurance business than I do. The gentleman is an expert on insurance, and I will take for granted what he says, but when one of these big companies collapses, it takes with it a number of smaller companies, as the gentleman knows, by reason of reinsurance, and so forth. Furthermore, these companies must dump their securities on the market to meet demands for return of unearned premiums on canceled policies. These companies constitute one of the largest groups of holders of mortgages on the homes and farms in America. The entire country is interested for that reason alone.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. In the bill it does not include mutual insurance companies, and the loans are upon capital stock.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, I am not sufficiently familiar with that detail to discuss it, but prefer to leave that to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I do know, however, that the bill is offered as a part of the administration program, to meet an acute emergency, to help to rehabilitate the insurance companies of America who find themselves in this critical position growing out of the depression.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. KENNEY. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has already loaned large sums of money to the insurance companies, has it not?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. KENNEY. And if this bill is put into effect, it will enable the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to accept preferred stock in payment of the loans made by it to the insurance companies?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; or to loan on such stock as collateral.

Mr. Speaker, this bill should pass today.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE].

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, if you will refer to page 4020 of the RECORD, to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] on yesterday, it will be seen that he is referring to the Globe & Rutgers Fire Insurance Co., and to the National Surety Co. Those are the only two companies that he names. I may be in error, but as I remember it, the National Surety Co. is in receivership now. I do not know about the other company. It is one of the largest surety companies in the world. I do not know the amount of salaries being paid at this time to the officials of their companies and other officials that will receive the benefit of this, if this rule is adopted and this measure approved, permitting the insurance companies to offer as collateral their notes, bonds, or debentures for loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, it will mean that these casualty and surety insurance companies will be allowed this additional $50,000,000 dole while the poor disabled war veterans and their dependents and the 13,000,000 unemployed generally will be left to local charity to be cared for. But it seems that the big international bankers, the railroads, and these insurance companies, who now have already received over $90,000,000 in loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, are to again be allowed to carry home the bacon and continue their reign of reckless salary payments to their officers unmolested.

PUBLICITY FOR INCOME-TAX PAYERS

Yesterday and today the Senate Investigating Committee has disclosed how easy it is for these big international bankers such as J. P. Morgan & Co. and their affiliates to evade the payment of their income taxes. Mr. Morgan frankly admits that he has not paid any income taxes for 1930, 1931, and 1932, neither have his wealthy partners, who are many. It seems that this Congress should now interest itself in tightening up the loopholes in our income tax law that make these evasions possible. Certainly proper legislation should be enacted at this session of Congress giving publicity to the income-tax returns to the end that the public generally may know more about the manipulations, maneuvers, and so forth, of these Wall Street pirates.

The bill provides $50,000,000 additional help as doles to be handed out to the insurance companies.

WE SHOULD HELP THE TAX PAYERS, NOT THE TAX DODGERS

We have heard a lot of comment in the last few days and a lot of tears have been shed for the stockholders of these corporations and similar corporations. When the Muscle Shoals bill was before us, tears of great anguish were shed here on the floor by some Members speaking for the Alabama Power Co. and other similar corporations whose stock might become less valuable if the Muscle Shoals project should pass. No doubt we will hear the same plea made today on behalf of the stockholders of these insurance companies. I am wondering why more of the Membership of this House does not take the floor and plead for the widows and orphans and the overburdened taxpayers of this country, who are burdened to death with taxes and cannot pay them, who are losing their homes and their property and their all? This is just another $50,000,000 dole to be handed out by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to these insurance companies, who have already been favored too much by the Government.

Mr. PEYSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield.

Mr. PEYSER. I can state that I believe this relief is not primarily for the stockholders as much as it is for the policyholders.

There are 60,000,000 policyholders in life-insurance companies, and if these companies are not helped then the public is not helped.

Mr. McFARLANE. In answer to that, I may say it is the same plea we heard at the time of the enactment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. Congress then was interested in helping the stockholders of those companies. I believe there is another side to that question, the one to which I have just referred, the taxpayers and the people of this country who already realize they have lost hundreds of millions of dollars in loans that have been doled out to these worthless companies. These loans ought to be stopped, and now is the time to stop further doles of this kind.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Would the gentleman call a secured loan a dole?

Mr. McFARLANE. They may be secured, but what is the value of the security? Charley Dawes came down here and went back with $90,000,000; the railroads come in and carry off millions not properly secured. Oh, yes; they have some worthless securities, but what could the Government realize on these securities for the money it is loaning to these people?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is it not a matter of administration to see that proper security is required?

Mr. McFARLANE. Oh, all laws are a matter of administration. The question is this, Is it right for us to stand up here in view of actual experience showing how poor the administration of these measures has been and by our vote and action embark the Government on further experiments along the same line? Are we to approve this kind of action?

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. If these companies are in need of financial assistance, is not one way they can secure it by cutting down the salaries of $100,000 to $175,000 a year they are paying their own officials?

Mr. McFARLANE. Certainly they should; and we should require that in this bill. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to insert in the RECORD at this point the salaries paid the officials of some of the principal insurance companies—the Equitable, the Metropolitan, the Mutual, the New York Life Insurance Co., and the Prudential Insurance Co.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. What would the gentleman say as to whether or not this is in keeping with what we did under the farm-allotment plan, where we tried to help 68,000,000 policyholders of insurance companies? Are we not really helping people out if we take this action?

Mr. McFARLANE. That depends upon the point of view of the gentleman. It all depends on the administration, and we have found out that the administration of some of these measures is detrimental to the rank and file of the taxpayers of this country in the losses suffered. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, S. 1094, with Mr. FULLER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, this bill represents an effort to continue the services of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation at this time. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act was recently amended so as to permit the Corporation to subscribe for preferred stock in banks, or to make loans, secured by preferred stock in banks as collateral.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act was an emergency measure. It could not be justified except as an emergency measure. If we were to review the services of the Corporation and discuss its various activities, of course we should not all agree as to the wisdom of each particular act or the helpfulness in each instance accomplished by the Corporation.

Certain it is, regardless of any fundamental considerations involved in the legislation, that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation supplied a measure of relief from the time it was placed in operation until this hour.

The present administration inherited the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It is desired by the present administration that we shall avail ourselves of the continued services of the Corporation during the continuance of the emergency which necessitated the enactment establishing the Corporation.

We think, we hope, and we pray that a better, a happier day is not far distant, that we shall soon experience such a recovery in business, such a resumption of the uses of normal credits, such a revival of business activities as will obviate further necessity for the services rendered by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. At this time we cannot say that we have reached that happy situation.

The insurance companies of the United States have shared in the misfortunes resulting from this depression. I have heard no contention that the business of insurance companies of the United States has not been conducted prudently, safely, and in accordance with thoroughly tested and established principles and safeguards. But we have witnessed a decline, a tremendous decline, in all values, and, of course, those in connection with which the insurance companies of the Nation have their investments.

There have been several failures of insurance companies. They are like banks. There can be no failure of one without hurtful consequences to the other. Many of the insurance companies are interlocked, such as fire and casualty companies. If I understand the situation, when application is made for insurance with one of these companies, it often happens that the company receiving the application does not carry all the risk involved in granting that application, but the risk is distributed among other companies so that in the nature of their business a misfortune that befalls one company is visited in many instances upon other companies.

Again, any misfortune to an insurance company, or insolvency of an insurance company, as in the instance of a bank, engenders distrust and results in a loss of confidence. The loss of confidence precipitates demands for cash payments, and often brings about, which has actually happened, a reduction in premium receipts and curtailment of the normal increases in business.

The insurance companies carry securities that ramify every activity in the country. They carry a large amount of farm mortgages, an enormous amount of home mortgages, in addition to what has always been regarded as high-class stocks and other securities.

If we hope to make progress—and I think it will be agreed we are making progress—toward improvement and recovery, we cannot afford to neglect the important part that must be played by the insurance companies in the general economic situation of the United States.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I gladly yield to my friend.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman tell us about how much the Government has advanced to insurance companies up to this time?

Mr. STEAGALL. The figures show there have been loans totaling about $90,000,000, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has outstanding now loans to insurance companies amounting to a little over $70,000,000. Of course, the loans now carried in these companies by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are involved in an effort to save these companies. That is an important consideration in connection with the measure before us.

After all, the case of the insurance companies is very much like that of the banks. If it becomes known that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is going to support the insurance companies by supplying credit, so far as it is justified, the restoration of confidence due to such a policy and such a declaration of purpose will itself accomplish a great deal of what is needed without the requirement of large loans by the Corporation.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Considering the magnitude of the insurance business, does the gentleman feel that $50,000,000 is going to be sufficient?

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman has asked me a question that I should not feel quite qualified to answer in my own right. Probably the gentleman is better informed than I am, but our committee was told by those who ought to know that the judgment was that the amount of $50,000,000 of loans to be made and outstanding at any one time would be sufficient to accomplish what is desired by this service.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Does the gentleman believe that the little fellow is going to have an opportunity to get some of this money?

Mr. STEAGALL. My information is that, as a rule, it is the little fellow who desires this legislation and who has asked for it and for whose benefit it is intended. I do not think there can be any separation of interest between small companies and large companies.

I can remember, when the little banks were failing and some of the large banks looked upon the situation with complacency and contentment, I warned the big bankers that the banking structure in this country was one building, and that if fire broke out in any corner it ought to be a source of serious concern to every occupant of the building. I think events have justified that statement. I think everybody will agree now that every bank, large or small, had a legitimate interest in the successful operation of every other bank, large or small. I think the same is true of the insurance companies.

We are laboring more toward the one object of restoring confidence in this country than any other one thing, and the passage of this legislation is the biggest service we can render so far as insurance companies are concerned, and they tell us $50,000,000 will accomplish the results desired.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. HOLMES. The primary purpose of this bill is to help stock insurance companies and not mutual insurance companies?

Mr. STEAGALL. I think, perhaps, the gentleman is placing a limit that is rather narrow upon the provisions of this bill. That will probably require an answer from someone more competent to pass on the question than I am; but this bill provides for the purchase of preferred stock or capital notes of insurance companies, and capital notes of insurance companies are evidences of indebtedness which are subordinated to other indebtedness, but which would be reimbursed in preference to stockholders of any class. I am advised that many of these companies which the gentleman has in mind have surplus accounts. The surplus account of an insurance company is the same, in practical effect, as capital stock. It stands over and above other indebtedness, and I should think that the companies to which the gentleman refers would be embraced in the provisions of this bill which would permit loans to be made on capital notes.

Mr. HOLMES. For a mutual life-insurance company?

Mr. STEAGALL. I should think so. I am not asserting this as against the gentleman's judgment. He is probably better informed on the subject than I am.

Mr. SPENCE and Mr. DONDERO rose.

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield first to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SPENCE. I think the gentleman's question is covered by section 11, which provides—

As used in this act the term "insurance company" shall include any corporation engaged in the business of insurance or in the writing of annuity contracts, irrespective of the nature thereof.

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; the language is just as broad as we can make it. The only difficulty, of course, arises out of the manner in which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make an advancement, and it must be upon preferred stock or upon capital notes. The question, of course, would recur, as suggested by the gentleman, with reference to mutual companies. The effort is to make it cover all insurance companies, and I think it does.

Mr. DONDERO. There would be no reason for eliminating legal insurance companies if we want to render the aid sought by this bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. The purpose of the bill is to try to aid all these institutions, because of their relation to the general economic situation and because of what is involved to the citizenship of the entire Nation. Thousands of citizens are interested as home owners, as owners of securities affected, and, above all, women and children are dependent on investments in life-insurance companies for education and for support in old age. Insurance companies hold the life savings of thousands of people who have put their all in the companies.

I want to say in that connection that some suggestion was made—I am not sure that I can quote it exactly—but it was to the effect that this legislation was designed to relieve the stockholders in insurance companies.

Let me say in that connection that nothing is further from the purpose or in the technical provisions of this bill. The purpose is to restore the capital structure of institutions to the point that brings them within the rule of solvency, so that under State law there will not be proceedings to liquidate companies or throw them into receiverships. The bill provides that loans or purchases by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be preferred over all stockholders of the company. So there can be no basis for the contention that the legislation is for the benefit of stockholders.

The purpose of the legislation is to save these institutions for the benefit of all the people by continuing the methods that have been employed in restoring normal business conditions in the United States.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PARSONS. Can the gentleman tell us with any certainty when we are going to stop unloading the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. STEAGALL. I wish I could assure the gentleman when that will happen. I am sure every Member of the House feels just as he does. The desire to reach the point where we may abandon the services of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is universal, and, frankly, I join him in the hope that the time will soon arrive. I am sure my friend and I are in agreement at this point.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. SNYDER. What we have been doing is for the purpose of restoring confidence. I am with the gentleman on this. But I want to mention this fact: I believe that 95 percent of all the people, when you mention the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, have sort of a dark screen thrown out in front of them. I am not saying that the Corporation did anything that they ought not to have done in the past, but if we could do away with the name Reconstruction Finance Corporation, it would establish confidence and bring hundreds of millions of dollars out of hiding and put it in our banks, because we would restore further confidence in our banks.

Mr. STEAGALL. I am aware of some criticism of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I do not think this legislation involves a range of discussion so wide as that. But I will say that we have instances where the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has advanced a bank in individual instances larger sums than the total loans that may be made to all the insurance companies of the country under the terms of this legislation.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. PARKER of New York. The gentleman is aware that the War Finance Corporation loaned under the Transportation Act a billion and half dollars to the railroads. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that all of that has been paid back except $38,000,000, and this amount is owed by the small railroads; and that the profits to the Corporation between the 6 percent the railroads paid and the 4 percent the Government borrowed, amounted to over $200,000,000? I think that shows conclusively that the money you are loaning now will come back to the Government; that it will be paid back by these institutions. I do not think that it is a gratuity; no more than it was in 1920 to the railroads.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield that I may ask a question of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. BEEDY. When we were making those loans we had some security for them.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes; we had security.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman realizes that under this bill we not only have no security but we subrogate the Government claims to those of other creditors.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I was not speaking particularly about this bill. I was speaking generally.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, to keep the record straight, we are not providing for making loans under this bill without security. On the contrary, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is required to take adequate security on all loans. The Corporation is permitted to purchase preferred stock or capital notes, that take the place of preferred stock, and the very purposes of such purchases or such loans is to restore the institution to a state of solvency.

The laws of the States under which the companies operate require them to keep in solvent condition, and it is only because the capital needs replenishment in order to restore a company to solvency that the Corporation may make loans on preferred stock or purchase capital notes. So that unless the officers in these States or officials of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation practice a fraud, these loans will be solvent and the Government will be protected. There is not a line in this bill that authorizes a dollar to be loaned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation without solvent security back of it to insure its return to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. We have the shining example of what the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has done to some banks. Take the Bank of Knoxville, Tenn. It joined with another bank with assets of about $25,000,000. They kept on drawing out of it, and then the bank came to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and borrowed, I think, $8,000,000. The depositors continued to still draw out their deposits until it got down to $12,000,000. The bank was closed. Every dollar that is left in that bank is pledged as a prior lien to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and there will not be 2 cents on the dollar to pay the depositors; and there are dozens of instances like that in the banks of the country.

Mr. STEAGALL. It is difficult to answer the gentleman when on one side we are told that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is going to make loans without security and on the other hand criticized because too much security has been required.

Mr. PARSONS. I want to answer the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER], if the gentleman will permit. The situation is quite different now from what it was in 1920. In making loans to the railroads and public institutions and utilities in 1920 they were on the upgrade then.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Oh, no.

Mr. PARSONS. We had prosperity in front of us, but the gentleman is aware of the fact that the condition of the country and of these various institutions at the present time presents an entirely different picture.

Mr. PARKER of New York. They were very similar to what they are today.

Mr. STEAGALL. The very fact that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is asking for this legislation, the very fact that these loans are not being made under existing law to these insurance companies, is proof positive that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is undertaking to observe the law of Congress which requires the Corporation to take adequate security on loans, and if that were not their attitude, there would be no reason for the administration submitting this bill to Congress. The present administration will be responsible for the conduct of the Corporation. I think we are justified in trusting this administration.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman stated that in the past the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has made single loans of much greater amount than that provided in this bill. I rise to ask whether the gentleman gives sanction or approval to the loan made to the Dawes bank in Chicago; whether that loan had his approval? I do not think it had, and I do not want the chairman to leave himself in the position before the country of approving a loan made to that bank on worthless security.

Mr. STEAGALL. I am not prepared to say just how much value there was in the securities back of the Dawes loan. I am not well enough informed to tell this House all that was involved in that transaction. I do not desire to discuss any individual loan of the Corporation, to approve it or disapprove it, to commend it or criticize it. I have not had time to trace individual transactions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in such a way as to form a fair judgment as to each and every loan. I simply call attention to the fact in answer to the suggestion that was made that under this bill there cannot be a total of more than $50,000,000 loaned to all of the insurance companies of the country, while there have been instances of loans of a larger amount than that in individual cases.

Mr. PARSONS. Fifty million dollars is the total amount of the loans?

Mr. STEAGALL. That is the limit which may be loaned to all of the insurance companies, so that it may be fairly contended that this is at least a modest, conservative plan which we have submitted for aid to insurance companies.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Unfortunately, I have been detained from the Chamber, and I have not heard all of the discussion; but it seems to me that if there is one fundamental reason for this bill, if there is a fundamental thing involved in it, it is the protection of every insurance-policy holder in the country.

Mr. STEAGALL. Certainly it is. It is a protection to the wife and children of every citizen of the United States who has put his life's earnings and accumulations into an insurance fund for their benefit. That is true.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Provided that it does not work out as the Knoxville Bank worked out, as many of them have so far; but we have extended the bonding power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation very much. I kept up with it for several months, but it is hard to do that any more, we have had so many measures in here during the last few weeks. I should like to know what is the total bonding power, including the capitalization, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. STEAGALL. I cannot give those figures exactly at this time. I can easily put them into the RECORD, but I cannot give them accurately at the moment.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I suggest that the original act provided for $500,000,000 revolving fund, with $1,500,000,000 bond issue? Later a bond issue of $1,800,000,000, making a total of $3,300,000,000 of bond issues and $500,000,000 appropriation. The public works bill just reported reduces that $1,200,000,000.

Mr. STEAGALL. And there are other drafts upon the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the farm relief bill and other measures, but I do not have the figures to furnish with accuracy, although I shall be glad to supply that information for the RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. What specific companies have requested this legislation or will be benefited by it?

Mr. STEAGALL. I am not prepared just now to name the companies who are in greatest need of this relief. I think the gentleman will agree with me that by naming a particular company and declaring to the world that a certain company is in distress would, in the nature of things, be calculated to defeat the purpose contemplated, one of which is to restore confidence in these institutions. I think the gentleman will agree with me in that statement.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Is it not a fact that most of this business of insurance, since the banks closed in this country, has been going into the hands of foreign companies?

Mr. STEAGALL. Oh, yes. I have not had an opportunity to cover the entire range of discussion involved in this legislation.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. And they can draw on foreign capital?

Mr. STEAGALL. But I am advised there has been a vast increase in business of foreign companies since the banking holiday in the United States and the collapse that occurred in February and March; there has been a considerable transfer of this business from American to foreign companies, which is a thing to be deplored, and which will be corrected if we succeed in restoring confidence and going forward with efforts for recovery.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. One further question, please: Is it not a fact that an English company doing business in this country can send to England for a million dollars with which to pay its obligations here, and only pay $800,000 in American money, according to the value of money today?

Mr. STEAGALL. Probably that statement is justified. Now, I must conclude.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. STEAGALL. Very well, but I must conclude.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Can the gentleman give us any information as to why the committee struck out the provision limiting the salaries?

Mr. STEAGALL. I will explain that under the 5-minute rule. I have taken so much time that I shall not be able to cover the details of this bill now as I had expected to do. They are simple. The bill is not long. Members will have no difficulty in understanding it when we consider the bill for amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that I have taken up so much time, I shall not attempt to discuss the bill in detail, but I will reserve further discussion until we read the measure for amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, I had not expected to make any statement regarding this bill. But as a member of the committee in possession of certain pertinent information, I feel that my failure to do so might be equivalent to a neglect of duty.

I wish to state very frankly that it has not been entirely easy for me to believe in the merits of several of its provisions, notwithstanding the fact that I recognize that it might be properly classified as an extension of the comprehensive emergency program inaugurated in 1932 to attack this depression along every front. My own reluctance and anxiety is due to my inability to subscribe to the wisdom of the policy herein involved. After a most careful study and thorough analysis, supplemented by the favorable opinion of those who are in a position to pass intelligently upon the soundness of legislation, it is my purpose, however, to support the bill provided certain amendments are made to it. After all, with this bill, when we hurdle the question of policy, its goodness or badness lies largely in the way it is administered. If properly and conservatively executed, as I have every reason to believe it will be, because of my faith and confidence in the present management of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, it can be used for constructive purposes in the public interest. I recognize that there are many worthy insurance institutions which, because of temporary conditions, are on the brink of the financial precipice and will, if permitted to go over, carry with them many an innocent and helpless creditor and contract holder. It is my purpose, however, to let the House know, so far as I am able to do so, exactly what we are doing in passing this bill.

Here, as in the case of banks, we leave the safety rule ever considered as the safeguard and anchor of the Government, which required that all loans should be fully and adequately secured. We even go farther than we did with the banks, for the reason that through assistance to the banks there was and is a greater public interest than can possibly be shown in connection with certain types of insurance companies which are today seeking aid through a measure of this character and upon whom the benefits will largely fall. Those of us who were here in 1932 appreciate the theory upon which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was established. It was then a question of restoring confidence by artificial and psychological methods. We were advised by the then responsible leaders that the depression was temporary and that in a fortnight or so all would be well. The idea was that in establishing this Corporation we would supply a stopgap and that its mere existence would have such a wonderfully stimulating effect that financial troubles would rapidly disappear. This, of course, was a false theory, and today, instead of serving as a stopgap, the Corporation has become a catch-all to save, by actually putting up the taxpayers' money, nearly every kind of failing business.

The question that we should ponder long here today is how much farther shall we go in this direction. Notwithstanding the loads of criticism which have been directed against the Corporation with respect to certain loans, and notwithstanding the mistakes which have been made in its administration, I am inclined to believe that by and large it has ameliorated a bad situation and softened the impact of the depression. I am also delighted to bear witness to the fact that from my own observation those in charge have rendered a prodigious and faithful public service and are entitled to much more consideration than they have received. We should realize that through this Corporation the Government's credit has been used to bolster private enterprise.

I am compelled at this time to remind the House that we are gradually doing, in legislation of this kind, what the Garner amendment in 1932 would have permitted the Corporation to do. Mr. Garner's view, shared by many of us, was that if the taxpayers' money was to be loaned to any firm or corporation it should, on the same terms and conditions, be extended to all. Time may or may not have proven the wisdom of such a position, but no man will deny its justice. This Government should not at any time extend its credit to a select favored clientele. That was the former Speaker's view.

All of us know that public confidence in some of our American insurance companies, particularly a few fire and casualty companies, has been shaken by the same causes which have undermined the credit structure of thousands of other institutions. It is almost impossible to appraise the disastrous result of this loss of confidence. We all know, however, that its restoration and revival among the people generally are essential if we are to come back to an economic equilibrium and prosperous business conditions. Without insurance, credit business would be an impossibility. In respect to the bill now before us, however, our information is that the companies whose outstanding contracts are really laced into the main credit structure of the Nation are not requesting loans. There is no doubt, however, that some of the companies which are in immediate need of Government assistance have far-reaching influence upon the individual's financial and business stability. Just how far the Government should go in assisting these and the others who cannot qualify under the existing law is a question of policy which each one of us must determine for himself.

Now let us examine the bill and briefly consider what can be done under it. In the first place, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is permitted to expand in the amount of $50,000,000 with which to carry out the provisions regarding assistance to insurance companies. Loans may be made to these companies either by the purchase of preferred stock or by lending on the legally issued capital of such companies. You will note that the third section of the bill provides that the Corporation shall not subscribe for or purchase any preferred stock or capital notes of any applicant insurance company until the company first shows to the satisfaction of the Corporation that it has unimpaired capital or that it will furnish new capital which will be subordinate to the preferred stock or capital notes bought by the Corporation. In the committee I undertook to throw a safeguard around this provision by offering an amendment to insert between the words "new" and "capital" the word "cash." And it is my purpose to offer the same amendment today when we reach that section under the 5-minute rule. With this amendment, the heart of the measure will be strengthened and the Government protected. Surely no one would contend that the applicant company should not be required to do as much as they asked the Government to do for them. Now remember that this is not a question of lending to one of these companies on full and adequate security, as that is being done now under the law, but rather one of aiding the company to repair its own broken capital structure. Expressed differently, the Federal Government is asked to become a partner.

In this connection, I think the House should know something about the policy of the Corporation in its treatment of and dealing with the smaller banks throughout the country. Notwithstanding the millions of dollars that have been loaned to larger institutions to keep them going when it should have been almost apparent that with some their days were numbered, today thousands of small banks, which never closed until the time of the President's proclamation, are unable to get any assistance whatever from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation toward reopening if they are indebted to the amount of one dollar. It should also be advertised here, in the interest of the public welfare, that the Corporation's bolt of red tape is getting larger and more knotty each day. Under the existing system it is exceedingly difficult to find out what should be done or to whom one should go to find out the proper thing to be done toward assisting the opening of a bank. I sincerely trust that none of you will encounter the perplexing, annoying, and unsatisfactory experience which I have recently had in such an effort. Where the fault should properly fall I am unable to say, but unless there is a simplification of the procedure and better coordinated effort on the part of the officials in charge, we may not expect many worthy institutions to open their doors until some of the depositors not now so old have gone to their reward. If you do not believe what I am saying you hit the path yourself.

I believe as much as any other man in the check-and-double-check system, and I am as anxious as anyone else that every precaution shall be taken to see that the banks when opened are in a strong and sound condition. But I do not believe that the present facilities for handling this situation are adequate, and I do not hesitate to say that there is much duplication of effort and, in spots, considerable lack of sympathy and understanding. My own experience made me feel as I can imagine a squirrel feels who is penned up in a cage and is left to hop from one side to the other with no chance to make headway or to get out.

There are some other interesting and amusing things going on which would make front-page news. In calling this situation to the attention of the Membership, I am not unmindful of the tremendous responsibilities which have been fully met and admirably discharged by some of those who are associated in this gigantic undertaking.

At the proper time it shall be my purpose to discuss the amendment which I propose to offer and which I believe will be helpful to those charged with the administration of the Corporation and protective to the taxpayers. All of us, however, who are planning to support this legislation may find comfort in the fact that there is nothing mandatory in the act and that all of its provisions are merely permissible.

I desire to divert here for just a minute to make another observation. Unless there is a radical change in the view of some who are administering this Corporation, with respect to the value of the assets in closed banks, and especially toward obligations collateralized by real estate, a gross injustice is going to be perpetrated upon thousands of worthy, deserving depositors throughout the country and in the end all will be grief. There could not be devised, in my opinion, any fairer or more effective way to provide necessary expansion of credit at this time than by making available funds to match the sound assets in the banks which are closed and thereby bring relief to millions of depositors in this hour of unparalleled suffering and depriation. If good mortgages, even liberally appraised, do not constitute better security than 50 percent of the collateral which now supports a billion dollars of the Reconstruction loans, night will not follow this day. Unless this situation is remedied quicker than is now indicated the unimaginable would not be surprising.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. I am wondering what plan of reflation and issuance of new currency the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I have for a long time believed in and advocated controlled inflation of credit and/or currency. For more than 2 years I have contended that the dollar was dishonest and that we were being crucified on a cross of gold. My primary objective was that we might restore to the debtor a dollar of practically the same value which he borrowed, and I still believe that unless this is done we will continue to face a long-drawn-out period of degeneration, continued business failures, bankruptcies, and suicides. In view of the fact that 90 percent of our currency has for many years consisted of checks drawn on deposits, and the fact that there has been a shrinkage of deposits of more than $16,000,000,000 in the past 2 years, and the further fact that there is perhaps a total of $6,000,000,000 of deposits frozen in closed banks, the need for expansion is more urgent today than any of us hope it will ever be again. It is common knowledge to all that in the present state of affairs check clearances through banks have shrunk to less than 50 percent of what they were in 1929. This alone tells its tale in business stagnation and personal financial bereavement. There are many of us who hope, however, that if the measure which we passed yesterday providing for an insurance of bank deposits is enacted into law a new and strong confidence will be born in the minds of the people everywhere and their faith will be restored in the safety of our banking institutions, with its inevitable beneficial effect throughout the breadth and length of the land.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. In further answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Texas, I might also add here that I have already expressed myself as believing that there could be no finer or more practical way at this time and under these conditions to make effective the plan of inflation of the currency as proposed by the Thomas amendment to the farm credit bill than by the immediate payment of the adjusted-service certificates. Through this channel the money would go out to every nook and cranny in the country and find its way into the pocketbooks of all classes of our citizens. If the Treasury notes proposed to be issued are to be made legal tender for the payment of debts I feel that these debts should be paid first. [Applause.] I also believe that payment of these certificates at this time would to a great extent serve as a substitute for the direct relief provided in the Wagner bill. In advocating this method of making effective a part of the program for inflation, I made it very clear, as I hope I may do now, that I would not encourage or favor any plan or movement unless it met with the approval of the President. In these words, familiar to you all, "Where he leads I am willing to follow." [Applause.]

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. Is this bill designed for casualty companies or life-insurance companies?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. This bill provides that if in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury any insurance company of any State of the United States is in need of funds for capital purposes he may with the approval of the President request the Corporation to subscribe for stock as I have outlined in the early part of my remarks. That is very broad language, and, if I understand it correctly, any company able to meet the requirements is eligible to apply. I say frankly to the gentleman that it is true that there were 4 or 5 fire and casualty companies which were used as illustrations in emphasizing the need for this legislation and what might be done through them to aid in the much-desired general economic rehabilitation.

Mr. TRUAX. Is it a fact that the larger life-insurance companies do not wish or desire any part of this appropriation?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I think that certain gentlemen of the committee advised us that many of the larger life companies were not interested in securing any assistance from the Government, since their reserves were in strong condition. It was also stated that some of the companies were opposed to this legislation, which is natural in the accustomed order of things here. But their view, though proper to be considered, would not control my judgment regarding the merits of the bill.

Mr. TRUAX. May I ask the gentleman this further question? Is it not a fact that this appropriation, if made, will largely go to save casualty companies that are practically broke because of guaranteeing bank deposits?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. It is, of course, beyond me to answer that question. It is true that such a rumor has percolated through the House somewhat freely, but I have not been able to trace its origin and I seriously question whether that is a fair innuendo. I feel that we sometimes make a mistake here in permitting casual remarks not based on actual facts or study to prejudice our judgment. On the other hand, I think one may rightfully be a little wary about so many different people representing the President. I have been satisfied from one source that the President feels that this legislation is needed. I do not feel, however, that we should get in the habit of being influenced by someone who, in his zeal to put legislation through the House, falls back upon the President for support. I believe that when he wants legislation he will tell us so in a simple, straightforward message and that we may hear it read from the Speaker's desk.

I regret that my time will not permit me at this point to outline the other important sections of the bill. I think the House should know that our committee was divided on the provision dealing with the limitation on salaries. I made this distinction: In the case of those companies which came to the Corporation for aid in repairing their capital, the Government to a certain extent automatically became a partner and should therefore properly consider the salaries which the officers of the companies received, and it was my impression that in those cases no salary should exceed $17,500. In the case of all other classes of borrowers from the Reconstruction Corporation it was thought that a different rule should apply. Many of us felt that the high salaries paid to officers of companies using the Government's credit were extortionate and unconscionable in these times and little short of an outright steal. In view of the fact, however, that such companies were private in their nature and were able to meet the test of full and adequate security and had come to the Corporation with clean hands, it was proper that their salaries should be considered and regulated, but that the amounts should be left to the discretion of the directors of the Reconstruction Corporation. Few in the committee, if any, felt that exorbitant salaries should be paid to any officer of any corporation that had to borrow the taxpayers' money to keep going. We were satisfied, after examining the chairman of the Reconstruction Corporation, that he would see that all the salaries paid by borrowing corporations were scaled down to a fair and reasonable level in keeping with present conditions. It is still the thought of many of us, after hearing his views, that this is perhaps the best solution of the salary problem. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CAVICCHIA].

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Mr. Chairman, I have heard it said on the floor here that millions of dollars of Government funds were lent to the Dawes bank, which was a bankrupt concern, but they forget to tell us that thirty or more million dollars of that loan have already been paid back into the Government coffers, and this money could not have been paid back if we had lent it to a bankrupt concern.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Let me first finish my statement and then, if I have time, I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

We hear so many half truths here that sometimes it becomes pretty hard even for Members of this body to know just what the truth is. We have been told that it will be a radical departure for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to lend money to these insurance companies when we have not done it heretofore. We have been lending money to life-insurance companies and to banks right along since this Corporation was organized. It is true that there was collateral given, but, in heaven's name, where did that collateral come from? Was it not from the money of those whose lives are insured and from the moneys of the depositors of these institutions? And whose money are you going to give to these insurance companies that we are trying to help by this bill?

It is the money of the stockholders who are ready to transfer their present holdings for preferred shares and to let their company keep on as a going concern.

We hear it said that we are going to loan this money to bankrupt insurance companies. Gentlemen, please make this distinction and keep it very clearly in mind: The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, if this measure becomes a law, is going to exercise its good judgment. Jesse Jones, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, appeared before the committee and urged that this law be passed and stated that the President wanted this law.

If my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] thinks that President Roosevelt should appear before us every time he is interested in the passage of legislation, perhaps the gentleman can get the President to come here personally.

I want you to make a distinction between insolvent concerns and unliquid concerns. We cannot help insolvent concerns; they are bankrupt. To loan money to such concerns would be money wasted. But there are many fire-insurance companies; and this law is primarily intended to help those fire-insurance companies that are perfectly solvent, that have millions of dollars' worth of securities.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is not going to give any money to bankrupt or insolvent concerns.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. If the corporations are solvent, they will be able to show that neither the capital nor the surplus is impaired. But, as I understand, the surplus and capital of companies have been impaired because the securities they have have decreased in value below what they originally claimed they had, and for that reason they desire relief because the insurance examiner claims that they are not solvent, because the present value of the securities has been reduced.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I am glad the gentleman brought that up, because the superintendents of insurance and banking of certain States are very anxious to appoint receivers who will work 10 or 15 years to liquidate the companies and will take millions of dollars for lawyers and receivers. Those insurance examiners do not like this legislation. I know of such cases.

Now, I want to state another thing. Many companies have borrowed money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and they have had to put up three or four dollars collateral for every dollar they got in the shape of a loan. That is why your commissioners of insurance and banking in many States say that these companies are insolvent.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman states that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will not make loans to bankrupt or insolvent companies. What about the Missouri Pacific Railroad, that received $20,000,000; what about the Union Trust Co. of Cleveland, that received $16,000,000; what about the Guardian Savings & Trust Co. of Cleveland, that received $15,000,000?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Jesse Jones, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, says that you can trust the Corporation to look after that. The gentleman has mentioned 3 or 4 companies which borrowed, and I assume from his question that the companies have become bankrupt; but that does not give us the entire facts, because hundreds of concerns throughout the country that have borrowed money are still in business, and many of them have paid back their loans, and the fact that a few have failed is no reason why we should not keep on relieving those that need help. Remember that the English companies are getting the business today that should go to American companies. Foreign companies can cable to Europe for money, pay 80 cents for an American dollar in London, and pass it in New York for 100 cents. If this keeps up, most of our American fire companies will eventually fail.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. What is to be the nature of the gentleman's remarks?

Mr. FISH. I want to speak on a resolution which I have introduced today.

Mr. McFARLANE. Affecting what subject?

Mr. FISH. Foreign affairs.

Mr. DEEN. And there is nothing to be said about Negro affairs?

Mr. FISH. No.

Mr. McFARLANE. Or about Cuba?

Mr. FISH. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I introduced the following resolution today, which is self-explanatory. It will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, and it will depend upon the unanimity and character of the support given it by the Jewish people in the United States and their friends whether I shall request immediate consideration. If it is clearly shown that the Jewish people are united in demanding immediate and favorable action on this resolution, I shall urge prompt consideration and adoption:

House concurrent resolution

Whereas the German Government is pursuing a relentless and ruthless policy of economic persecution and repression of Jews in Germany; and

Whereas it is the avowed intention of the German Government to deprive the Jews of their civic, political, and economic rights; and

Whereas the comparatively small number of Jews in Germany, not exceeding 600,000, or 1 percent of the German population, constitute a peaceful, law-abiding, industrious, and defenseless element of the population: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States regrets the continued persecution of the Jews in Germany and expresses its sympathy for them in their hour of trial, humiliation, and economic discrimination, and requests the President of the United States to use his good offices and make friendly representation to the German Government in the interest of humanity, justice, and world peace, to respect the civic and economic rights of its citizens of Jewish origin, and to put an end to racial and religious persecution.

As a friend of the German people, without in any way desiring to interfere with their domestic institutions or believing in the recent physical-atrocity charges, I appeal to their sense of justice and spirit of tolerance and fair play not to turn back the hands of progress two centuries by disqualifying German Jews of citizenship and economic rights and driving them once again as outcasts into the crowded and poverty-stricken Ghetto.

I do not question the stability of the Hitler government, or that it represents the views of a majority of the German people. It is none of our business what form of government exists in any foreign nation, whether it be republican, monarchical, Fascist, or Communist. For many years I have sympathized with the German people in their efforts to build up a united country under the harsh provisions of the Versailles Treaty, conceived in hate, fear, cupidity, and signed under coercion.

I am aware of the difficulties that have arisen in Germany since the end of the World War because of the growth of a powerful and aggressive Communist Party, composed of 5,000,000 people, teaching class hatred, destruction of religion and private property, and spreading internal disorders and urging the seizure of the German Government by force and violence. It is very likely that the Hitler dictatorship was necessary in view of the strength and revolutionary activities of the Communist, which undermined the stability of the German Republic. Just as communism was the main reason for the rapid growth of fascism in Italy, so likewise in Germany it was an important factor in bringing about the Nazi dictatorship.

I do not deny that some German Jews were active in the Communist Party, but that is no reason to indict a whole race of 600,000 people because a small percentage were followers of Karl Marx and a smaller percentage were Communists.

As the author of the Zionist resolution for a homeland for the Jewish people in Palestine, which passed the Congress 10 years ago, I urge the German Jews and Jews throughout the world not to compromise or sacrifice their ancient faith to communism, with its avowed hatred of God and of all religious beliefs, but to stand firmly in opposition to this revolutionary and destructive force, which seeks to promote class hatred, atheism, and the destruction of human liberty.

It seems to me that this is an opportune time to exert every effort to further develop Palestine as a homeland for those Jews who are being persecuted in Germany or in any other nation.

My message to the Jews of America is to redouble their faith in our free institutions and our constitutional and republican form of government, which guarantees to every citizen an equal opportunity under the law and the right to life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness. In no country have the Jews so prospered as in the United States under our democratic system of government. In the last election Jewish governors were elected in New York and in Illinois, two of the largest of our States.

There is no room for communism or any form of foreign dictatorship in the United States. The Jews of America who came here to enjoy the equal opportunities and the protection afforded by our laws appreciate the blessings of liberty and justice under our republican form of government and should be the first to uphold it and defend it against all of its enemies from within and from without. Any other course would not only be ungrateful but suicidal and against their own interests.

No right-thinking American Jew, having the welfare of his people at heart, would ever consider surrendering the blessing of liberty and justice under our free institutions for either communism or fascism. The Jews of America should shun communism and all its works as their worst and most dangerous enemy. The loyal and conservative Jews, who are in an overwhelming majority, have a right to form leagues to combat anti-Semitism, but in their own interest have a duty to organize effective opposition to communism and to combat it in every way among their own people.

The tragic persecution of the Jews in Germany is just another page in the long and dark history of the much-suffering Jewish people. The American Government has never given any sanction to bigotry or assistance to persecution, but, on the other hand, does guarantee to all citizens full liberty of conscience. Our traditional American policy toward our citizens of Jewish origin is best expressed in the words of George Washington to the Jewish congregation at Newport in 1790:

May the children of the stock of Abraham who dwell in this land continue to merit and enjoy the good will of the other inhabitants, while everyone shall sit in safety under his own vine and fig tree, and there shall be none to make him afraid.

As one who has opposed communism in all forms, I appeal for a square deal and justice for the great majority of the Jewish people in Germany, as elsewhere, who are decent and honorable citizens, practicing an ancient faith in peace and tranquillity and desiring merely the protection of their lives, property, and an equal opportunity to work. A continuation of the economic persecution of the Jews would be a disgrace to the cause of human liberty and modern civilization and will be a constant source of friction and irritation in maintaining friendly relations between nations. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, there are things about this bill that I am not very keen about and do not like. In the first place, we are opening up the Federal jackpot to another bunch of looters, such as are on the witness stand over in the other end of the Capitol today, that have not paid any income taxes for years. I speak of J. Pierpont Morgan and his associates. This does not apply to insurance only, but on page 7 you will find that the bill authorizes the loaning of money by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to railroad trustees. In other words, the railroads that have already borrowed money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and are now in the hands of receivers, can as it is now proposed borrow more money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the bankrupt railroads. Let me give you one little illustration. If I am correctly informed, a little over a year ago the Soo Line Railroad defaulted on about $5,000,000 worth of bonds. It could not pay the face of the bonds and it could not pay the interest. The president of the Soo Line was also a director in the First National Bank Corporation of Minneapolis, a chain banking company. Being the president of the railroad company and being a director in that bank, he knew where the outstanding bonds were, the bonds upon which the default had been made. So agents of the bank, security salesmen, went out and cheated the poor people out of the bonds and bought them for about 20 cents on the dollar, and after the president of the Soo Line Railroad Co., through the bank in which he was a director, got control of the bonds that they had purchased all the way from 25 to 35 cents on the dollar, they then came down here to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and turned them over and got $5,000,000 with which to pay off the debts they had bought up for 25 to 35 cents on the dollar, or less, thereby making in the neighborhood of two or three million five hundred thousand dollars clear profit for themselves.

I am almost at my wit's end when it comes to voting money to these big corporations. We were told that we could not have 3-percent money for the farmers, because, if we fixed the rate in the farm bill at 3 percent, it would make it impossible for the insurance companies to exist, and that is why it had to be shoved up to 4½ and 5 percent. These insurance companies are already throttling our farmers, they already have them by the throat, and they are in a death struggle, and yet we are going to give them more money so that they can clamp their clutches tighter around the necks of the farmer.

With regard to the soldiers, only yesterday a case came to me where a veteran was discharged from the Army in 1919 as totally disabled. He paid his insurance for 2 years after he was discharged and then he was adjudicated insane and sent to an insane asylum in the State of Minnesota, where he died on the 19th of last January, and because his widow did not know about the new laws that this Congress passed she did not file the application for her life insurance in time. That claim I now have in my possession, together with the receipt for the premiums paid, and because she did not file that claim before the 1st of April 1933 I am told that she cannot get a penny of that insurance. Here was a man who since 1919 had been in an insane hospital.

We can take things away from those who suffer, those who are in need, and turn them over to the hands of great corporations who today are the ones that have brought destruction and ruin on this great country of ours. So long as I am here on this floor, I am going to quit voting money for all these foolish propositions, while there are 16,000,000 men walking the streets and highways and byways, without a thing to eat, in a land of plenty, where everything is so abundant, where we have so much wheat that the people have to go without bread, where we have so much butter that they have to eat molasses, and have not got that, where we have so many shoes that they have to go barefoot. And here we are quibbling and voting to save the life-insurance companies. When are we going to do something for the American taxpayer? The thing to do is for this Congress to resolve itself and put through a proposition which will go down into the pockets of the contemptible tax dodgers who have been dodging their income taxes through the years in this country, from J. Pierpont Morgan on down, and make them pay up what they owe, and we will soon balance the Budget and quit our fooling, for after all we are only fooling ourselves.

I wish to add further that when the time comes, as it already has, when the United States of America will repudiate its own insurance policies given in solemn faith to its veterans who fought in the World War and deprive their widows of the money that is rightfully owing to them and then appropriate $50,000,000 to loan to private insurance companies and bankrupt railroads it is time to call a halt. And I also wish to call your attention to the fact that these same companies who will be making loans from this new fund, according to the records, are now paying their presidents and officers exorbitant salaries that run from $50,000 per year to $175,000 per year, and we here are asked to take money out of the pockets of the poor taxpayers and assist in paying these exorbitant salaries through loans made by these companies from the United States Treasury or the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Another thing about this bill is that it is authorizing more debts and more tax-free bonds amounting to $50,000,000, which must be again assessed upon the taxpayers of this great land.

Let me call your attention to the fact that the legislation that we passed yesterday carried with it appropriations to the amount of $150,000,000, and at the rate we are proceeding to run this Government into debt, if it continues, we will be worse than bankrupt ourselves within another 30 days. All these bonds are tax-free. They will be bought up at a discount by the very Morgan group and their affiliates who are now being investigated in the other end of this building, and then Morgan & Co. will again bring these bonds to our Printing and Engraving plant and have printed nice new, crisp paper money that will be put into circulation against these bonds, so that Morgan & Co. will not only draw an interest on the original bonds but can loan out the new money which they got tax free and interest free through the printing by Uncle Sam, and rob our people still further.

When shall this mad orgy end? Shall we wait forever depriving the farmers and wage-workers of their rightful position with American Government, and deliberately violate every sacred contract entered into with our crippled soldiers and war veterans? So far as I am concerned, I say that the time has come to think of some constructive statesmanship and some laws that will open the books of our Internal Revenue Department and make public the amount of income taxes paid by every citizen of the United States. Had there been no secrecy with regard to our income taxes do you think that Morgan and his financial racketeers, looters, and thieves could have got away for years without paying any income taxes? Unless we, the Congress of the United States, come to our senses and do a little legislating along constructive lines, let me assure you that we may find ourselves no longer in Congress, and that the people may rise up, as they are doing throughout many parts of our country, and take the law into their own hands; not because of their radicalism, but because we, the Congress of the United States of America have failed to do our duty, and have failed to live up to our oaths of office. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DEEN].

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention for 2 or 3 minutes to some of the salaries paid to officials of some of the insurance companies as follows:

Salaries paid officials

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEEN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. When Mr. David F. Houston was in Texas he was one of my professors in the State University at Austin, and his salary then was not over $7,500 a year, but as soon as he becomes president of the Mutual Life Insurance Co. his services immediately become more valuable, and he gets first $100,000 per year, and then they raise it in 1932 to $125,000 per annum. They are doing it with money that should go to widows and orphans after their policyholder dies.

Mr. DEEN. I am sure he is a splendid teacher. The gentleman is an excellent student of his, but he is not worth an annual salary of $125,000.

Mr. BLANTON. He is not worth half of it or one fourth of it. And paying such outrageous salaries is what has gotten these insurance companies in these financial straits.

Mr. DEEN (continuing reading the salaries of the officials of the Mutual Life Insurance Co.):

Mr. Chairman, may I say just this word—that the request of the insurance companies of the United States coming to this Congress through the present bill reported by the committee would come with better grace to this Congress if the officials of those companies had not in 1929 raised their salaries. The beginning of the panic was in 1929, and at that time they were receiving enormous salaries. If the insurance company officials had not raised their salaries in 1932, they could come with much better grace to this House now and seek legislation for loans. This House is interested in the insurance companies, because we all have policies with them. At the same time we are not interested in lending money endorsed by the Federal Government through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to companies to pay them these enormous, extravagant salaries. They are not worth it. You are not and I am not, and no man in this country is worth $175,000 a year to operate an insurance company.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DEEN] has expired.

Mr. LUCE. I yield the gentleman one half additional minute.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEEN. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Since the gentleman has very properly referred to the fact that a number of the officers of these companies which are borrowing taxpayers' assessments from the Government have increased their salaries during the depression, and, perhaps, in some instances out of this borrowed money, I think the Record ought to show that the present chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation made it clear to our committee that he thought there were cases where the officers' salaries of the borrowing institutions were extortionate and ought to be materially reduced to the level of present times. In fairness to him it should also be understood that though he did not advocate it, he was not opposed to the salary provision in the act as it passed the Senate. Every member of the committee remembers his candor on this point.

Mr. DEEN. Why did the committee, in submitting this bill, strike out $17,500 and make it in the discretion of the Corporation?

Mr. BLANTON. We ought to put that limitation on maximum salaries allowed back in the bill, or we ought to defeat this bill.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. There was a division in the committee about that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DEEN] has again expired.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I am going to use 2 or 3 minutes, and then I am going to achieve an ambition that has been close to my heart ever since I have been in Congress. I am going to break all records by giving back virtually half of the hour to the House.

It has seemed to me most unfortunate that we have fallen into the habit of using up every minute of the hour a Member recognized may consume, speaking himself or yielding time to others, when the hour is not needed.

So, sir, after saying that I am going to vote for this bill, in my belief that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation can be trusted to carry out what is evidently the will of the House, and in so doing to exercise sound judgment, I am going to go to the reading of the bill for amendment under the 5-minute rule where questions that have just been asked may be discussed. I give back the rest of my time to the House. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, realizing the importance of this legislation, I have insisted that we should give the House an open rule on this bill and allow the Members the right to offer amendments and change the bill if they can, to make it workable and beneficial legislation, if that be possible.

I myself feel that the bill should not receive the vote or approval of this House. I have been for every proposition that was recommended, advocated, or requested by the President, and I shall continue this policy, but I doubt very much that he is really interested in this proposed legislation.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I may say to the gentleman that had the President of the United States not demanded this legislation, it would never be before us for consideration.

Mr. SABATH. I have no knowledge that the President favors it, though some gentlemen say that he does; but, knowing him as I do, I am satisfied that he would not advocate this proposed legislation, especially in view of the fact that the public works bill, in which he is interested and for which a rule was granted today and which will come up for consideration tomorrow, really eliminates the only redeeming features in the bill we are now considering. The members of the Committee on Banking and Currency may not know this, because the bill was reported only yesterday by the Ways and Means Committee, but the language to which I call attention is as follows:

After the expiration of 10 days after the date upon which the Administrator has qualified and taken office, no application shall be approved by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under the provision of subsection (a) of section 201 of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932.

This really destroys every provision in the so-called "insurance bill" that was aimed to help that bill pass the House. To make possible its passage the insurance bill contains provisions that would aid States and municipalities with their construction work, but the action the House will take tomorrow will absolutely destroy nearly every provision of this bill.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Then should we not lay this bill on the table?

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman heard what I said. It is not always easy to make oneself as clear as one would like.

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. DEEN. Does the gentleman know what salary is paid the chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation? I ask this as a matter of information.

Mr. SABATH. I compliment the gentleman upon the information he gave to the House this afternoon. Heretofore on several occasions I have called the attention of the House to the salaries. The very railroads that came here pleading for relief and that obtained large loans paid their officers $100,000 or $125,000 a year. These individuals squander the money of the railroads, waste it, vote it to themselves, and then they come down to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for relief and aid.

This practice should cease, and it is high time that we make a start in this direction. We should make the start on this bill today. [Applause.] We should prevent similar demands upon the House in the future.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I understood the gentleman to say he was very much pleased that the bill was brought in under a rule giving the Members an opportunity to amend it.

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the bill which will be brought in tomorrow will be brought in under a similar liberal rule?

Mr. SABATH. I regret exceedingly that the bill that will be brought in tomorrow will not come in under such a liberal rule.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Did the gentleman vote for that liberal rule yesterday?

Mr. SABATH. I was speaking of the rule under which the bill we are now considering was brought in. When we take up consideration of the rule tomorrow I shall explain the reasons for it.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that this bill should not pass in its present form because all the good it could do has been eliminated. And what little remains will be absolutely nullified by the bill that will pass the House within a day or two. Consequently there is no reason for any of us who tried to enact legislation that would create employment and relieve the distressed conditions of municipalities and States to vote for this bill. I am inclined to believe that the President has been imposed upon by a few casualty companies, who have misinformed him as to the facts.

This will not aid the life-insurance companies or the policyholders. This will help only a few men who lost the money of their companies by buying questionable securities from such great investment bankers as the one who is testifying before a committee at the other end of the Capitol today. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. My time has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. I wish the gentleman would tell us his views before he sits down. I have not heard him state his reasons yet.

Mr. SABATH. Had the gentleman been listening he would have heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That during the continuance of the existing emergency heretofore recognized by Public No. 1 of the Seventy-third Congress or until this act shall be declared no longer operative by proclamation of the President, and notwithstanding any other provision of any other law, if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, any insurance company of any State of the United States is in need of funds for capital purposes either in connection with the organization of such company or otherwise, he may, with the approval of the President, request the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to subscribe for preferred stock of any class, exempt from assessment or additional liability, in such insurance company, or to make loans secured by such stock as collateral, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may comply with such request. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, sell in the open market the whole or any part of the preferred stock of any such insurance company acquired by the corporation pursuant to this section. The amount of notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue and to have outstanding at any one time under existing law is hereby increased by $50,000,000, in order to provide funds to carry out the provisions of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 12, after the word "section", strike out the language down to and including the word "act" on line 18 and insert the following: "The total face amount of loans, subscriptions to preferred stock, and purchase of capital notes which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may have outstanding at any one time under the provisions of this section and section 2 of this act shall not exceed $50,000,000, and the amount of notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue and to have outstanding at any one time under existing law is hereby increased by an amount sufficient to carry out the provisions of this section."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the committee amendment is simply to clarify the language and make definite and unquestionable the purpose to limit the total of loans to the sum of $50,000,000.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. My recollection is that in general debate the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] stated to the membership here that no life-insurance company would get any benefits out of this bill.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I can straighten that out with my friend. I did not mean to say that any life insurance company was prohibited under the bill from securing the benefits of this proposed law. What I meant to say was that the insurance companies that wanted this law passed are not life-insurance companies, but casualty companies.

Mr. GOSS. That is true, but I understood the gentleman in his remarks to say that no life-insurance company would participate.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. If I said that I made a mistake.

Mr. GOSS. Then any life-insurance company could come in under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. That is correct.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I did not have any time in general debate and I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object to this extension of time, but this committee has had 2 pretty hard days and we are rather tired, and I shall hope that the remarks will be confined to the bill after this and that we do not have any further extensions of time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

MORE TAX-EXEMPT INTEREST-BEARING BONDS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides that $50,000,000 in Government securities may be sold and the money delivered to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may use this money to help certain insurance companies.

It is my understanding the insurance companies have already been pretty well taken care of under legislation passed creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but this bill goes much further and provides that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may purchase the preferred stock of an insurance company.

One part of this bill that is very objectionable to me is the issuance of more tax-exempt interest-bearing securities of the Government of the United States.

When will there ever be any incentive for people to place their money in industry, commerce, or agriculture as long as they can purchase Government bonds that, of course, are guaranteed by the Government of the United States, and in this way have a more convenient place for their money? As evidence of the fact that money will be used to purchase Government bonds when they can be purchased, take the statement yesterday filed before a Senate committee by Mr. Morgan, of the house of Morgan, which indicates that during the last few years his institution has been selling off its other stocks and bonds and other properties and purchasing Government bonds, and now the institution holds Government bonds aggregating in value $224,000,000. Last year this institution drew in interest more than $7,500,000 on these bonds from the Government, and drew this much money the year before, and did not pay one penny of income tax to the United States Government.

NEW MONEY SHOULD BE ISSUED

The connection with the bill is this: Is it right and fair that Government bonds be issued and sold to Mr. Morgan? Mr. Morgan will take the bonds and keep them in the vaults of his bank. The money that Mr. Morgan sends to Washington will be delivered to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will deliver that money back to one of Mr. Morgan's insurance companies, and he gets it right back again. In addition to this, if Mr. Morgan wants more money, he can have these bonds put up with the Treasury of the United States and have the Bureau of Engraving and Printing print $224,000,000 worth of new money, if he wants it and if he uses the proper channels to get it.

MORGAN CAN EXCHANGE BONDS FOR NEW MONEY

If he should purchase the $50,000,000 of bonds authorized under this bill, he can take these bonds through banking channels and place them with the Federal Reserve or with the Treasury of the United States and get new money issued in return for these bonds, and at the same time he is using the money he will also get interest on the bonds, and then the money comes right back to his insurance corporation.

ABUSE OF GOVERNMENT CREDIT

I think it is time we should call a halt on such proceedings as this. It is an idiotic and imbecilic system that we have with respect to the use and, I might say, the abuse of the credit of the Government of the United States.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PATMAN. For a question; yes.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman calls these Government bonds; is it not true that they are Reconstruction Finance Corporation bonds or debentures?

Mr. PATMAN. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation never issued one dollar of bonds, because the act is unconstitutional. No one will stand up here and claim that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act is constitutional. Therefore they have never attempted to sell any bonds to the people. All these debentures are delivered to the United States Treasury and the United States Treasury sells Government securities and delivers the money to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in return for its debentures. Therefore they handle it through the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield for a question.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman seems to be quite well informed on this legislation. Can he advise us whether this is a part of the President's program?

Mr. PATMAN. I am not in position to advise the gentleman on that. I know nothing about it.

Of all the people that should be favored at this time with special legislation, taking up our time here, the Morgan and Mellon groups, who would profit so much by reason of this legislation, should be the last.

SECRET TAX SYSTEM

I can tell you one little law that you could pass in 10 minutes' time that would balance this Budget, which is so much unbalanced today, and that little law would be one requiring publicity of income-tax returns. [Applause.]

I have such a bill pending before the Ways and Means Committee at this time.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. For a brief question.

Mr. McFARLANE. I am wondering if Members of the House know that the Internal Revenue Department refuses to furnish Members of the House with any information as to matters under discussion here?

Mr. PATMAN. Some Members of the House probably do not know that we have here a system of secret taxation. We have the same kind of a system that put Chicago on the rocks. They used to have a secret tax system, and no resident of Chicago could tell you how much his neighbor was paying in taxes. Some people were paying no taxes at all, others much less than some others. We have a secret tax system in this country. There is no reason why the tax returns should not be open to public inspection. The tax records of all cities, counties, and States are subject to public inspection, so why should we favor the Morgans, Mellons, Mills, Meyers, and Mitchells with secret returns?

If you will make the income-tax returns public, you will not have to pass a gasoline tax or a sales tax. You will collect plenty of money. [Applause.]

Do you think that Mr. Morgan would have dared to refuse to pay taxes during the years 1931 and 1932 if he had known that the tax returns would be subject to public inspection? No; he knew they were secret and that nobody would ever see them. There was no danger or risk in his refusing to pay an income tax or make a full return.

We should make income-tax returns subject to public inspection. We need not publish them. There is no reason why they should be published, but any citizen of the United States who desires to see one should be permitted to see it.

I want to tell you that in this investigation—although the newspapers say they are being handled with kid gloves—if the investigation continues you are going to see all kinds of tax frauds uncovered. I do not believe a majority of the Senate investigating committee will refuse to support Mr. Pecora in his effort to turn the light on the House of Morgan.

MELLON-MORGAN GROUP SHOULD BE EXPELLED

I am one of the Members on this side of the aisle who believe that the Mellon-Morgan group met defeat at the polls last November, and I hope that no member of the group will be taken into the confidence or his advice taken or heeded by the present administration in any way, shape, or manner. [Applause.]

We have had enough of Mellonitis—it is Mellonitis that has almost destroyed our country. Mellon and Morgan absolutely refuse to obey the law—they think that they are above the law. They believe in law and order as long as they can make the law and give the order.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman should confine his remarks to the bill.

Mr. PATMAN. Now, as to this man Mellon, he holds $175,000,000 worth of Government bonds in two of his banking institutions, collecting $7,000,000 in interest from the Government on them annually. I just wonder how much income tax he paid last year or he has paid during the last 12 years. You cannot find out because the income-tax returns are secret. You ought to make them subject to public inspection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do this in order to tell my colleagues of a little experience a city in my district recently had with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The people of the city were naturally encouraged by reading reports that the Congress had appropriated large sums of money for this Corporation to relieve industry, the railroads, the banks, the insurance companies, as well as the municipalities and other subdivisions of our Government. They decided they would make application to enlarge and improve their waterworks. They filed the application and members of the delegation from my State requested that it be favorably considered. It was turned down some time ago. A few days ago the Honorable L. B. Alexander, the mayor of this town, Waldo, made a trip up here and appeared before representatives of the Corporation personally and most ably explained the purpose of the application, and explained that their little water plant had been self-liquidating and would be self-liquidating in the future. They asked for $6,500. Why, that amount would not have been 1 day's interest on the amount that the Corporation had been loaning to the railroad companies. I doubt if it would have paid 10 minutes' interest on the $80,000,000 which the newspaper reports say that Mr. Dawes, a former chairman, received from the Corporation for a Chicago bank. I do not believe it would have paid the interest for 2 days on the amount of money the railroad companies had borrowed, and by the way, the newspaper reports say that those railroad companies, many of them, have now defaulted on the interest. But that is neither here nor there.

The mayor appeared and explained that they had in their water fund a surplus of $800, that they had in their general city treasury a surplus of $1,300 or $1,400 in cash, that there was not a bond outstanding or a penny of indebtedness against the whole city and that every user of the water now, and everyone to be added to the system through the improvements, was a permanent resident of the city and owners of their homes and able to pay for water used. We were advised by the corporation officials that they did not think that we should be permitted to borrow unless we went back to our little town and had the people vote bonds and then turn the bonds over to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for collateral. We had always been under the impression that the two billion six or eight hundred million dollars that we had appropriated and authorized for this Corporation was to be loaned to our municipalities direct and without bond issuance. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation in this instance, at least it seems to me, would occupy the role of bondbroker merely to handle the bonds for our little city. This city had also held an election last December in which a very large majority of the voters voted favorably for this very improvement. The Corporation wants to stand behind a clause in the constitution of our State and demand that the city of Waldo vote a bond. Why should we, in conscience, continue to appropriate money for this Corporation which has so utterly failed to relieve the municipalities in my State, particularly this one which wanted only $6,500. My friends, it is ridiculous.

It seems to me that there should be a more liberal interpretation of the law by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I fully appreciate the fact that the Corporation should have securities for the loans and that they should be most careful in the way they handle the public's money, but from newspaper reports—I do not say that they are so, but I believe they are—the Corporation has been loaning millions and millions of dollars on security far weaker than that offered by the city of Waldo, Fla.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. The loan has been approved by the voters of the town. The thing I should like to say further is this: That it is common practice by towns in my State for the city or town officials to give their notes for indebtedness over a period of years. Individuals and firms accept these notes and they are invariably paid at maturity. Our individuals and firms sell to cities on credit and also loan money, taking only such open notes as security, but the Reconstruction Finance Corporation attempts to hold that the city cannot borrow for more than 12 months upon such open notes, even though the project would be self-liquidating. In my opinion this Waldo project is in fact a self-liquidating project, and the city will meet the obligations which it seeks to enter. The corporation now has it under consideration and, we hope, may even yet act favorably. I call this case to the attention of my colleagues for consideration in connection with the bill before us, which will allow a huge sum for the large corporate interests.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to let the Committee understand what is involved in the amendment now under consideration. The original bill as it passed the Senate contained language which we thought was not entirely definite in fixing the limit of loans that might be made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under this bill. The House Committee on Banking and Currency amended it to make it most specific and definite and unquestioned that there cannot be loans in excess of a total amount of $50,000,000. That is the amendment on which the Committee is about to vote.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that a bill of this kind at this time of the session has found its way into the House. I thought when the insurance companies borrowed $90,000,000 of the taxpayers' money that they would be satisfied, but now they come back here today. Possibly the indemnity companies have not got all they wanted, and they come back now and want $50,000,000 more to be loaned to them. Oh, you say, let the Reconstruction Finance Corporation advance the money. Do you know what you are doing with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation? You are dealing out the public's cash through that agency. Let us think for a moment where we are going. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has already loaned over $2,000,000,000 of the people's money on the direction of this Congress. We have advanced $2,000,000,000 to go to the relief of farm mortgages, $2,000,000,000 to go to the relief of home owners, which they needed so badly. That makes $4,000,000,000. Tomorrow we are coming back with a little bill asking you for only $3,300,000,000; more than $7,000,000,000 for this Congress alone. I am not going to vote for anything in the way of a further appropriation that does not go to relieve some man who is out of employment. These big indemnity companies are not out of business. When they are able to pay such salaries as have been put into the RECORD here today, some of them as much as $200,000 per year, they ought to be ashamed to come here at this time and ask this Congress to appropriate further money to carry on such conduct as that.

The members of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation only get $10,000 a year. The men at the head of these insurance companies, or some of them, drawing $175,000 a year, and now they come here and want you by your vote to put a further burden on your people to give them more money. I am not going to do it as far as I am concerned.

I believe this bill ought to be killed right here on the floor of this House today and this extravagance stopped.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. I yield.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Does not the gentleman realize that the list of high-salaried men which the gentleman read a moment ago applies to life-insurance companies?

Mr. GLOVER. Oh, did you not hear him tell how it might be applied to life-insurance companies and indemnity companies?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. They might come in, yes; but this is for a type of insurance company that cannot afford to pay such salaries.

Mr. GLOVER. Will you please tell me what the president of the Globe Indemnity Co. is drawing now?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I do not think he is drawing anything today.

Mr. GLOVER. Oh, no. He is like the gentleman over in the Senate who does not make anything, Mr. Morgan. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Would the gentleman like to pay the losses that Mr. Morgan had from 1929 to 1932?

Mr. GLOVER. I am not associating with Mr. Morgan's kind of business. He has been trying to put over some things, and lost, and he might have had a right to lose some of it, because he was trying to do things he ought not to have done.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Why does the gentleman not be fair and wait until the investigation is finished?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. If Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan has such a wonderful defender and protector in the United States Senate, surely my friend from Arkansas ought not to object to Mr. Morgan's having an equally good defender in the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. GLOVER. Well, I do not want to be spokesman for him myself, and that is not all of it. I am not going to be. I am going to think of the good people back home who are going to be burdened with every cent of this if it is voted out. You have to dig it out of the people by taxation. During the administration that has just gone out we chided you for such extravagance, and what are we doing? You set a pace for us that is a snail's pace compared to what we are doing. [Laughter.] I tell you as Democrats we ought to come to a halt on this kind of thing. I am going to do it as far as I am concerned on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER] has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment do now close. This is purely a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment on the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEEDY: Pages 1 and 2, strike out section 1 and insert in lieu thereof the following section:

"Whenever during the existing emergency any insurance company, whether through bad management or otherwise, has exhausted its resources, it may be accommodated with funds by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by delivering to the said Corporation promissory notes."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman, I want 5 minutes.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I want 5 minutes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I have tried to boil down into a few words the real meaning of this bill. All this bill provides is that whenever during the existing emergency any insurance company, whether through bad management or otherwise, has exhausted its resources, impaired its capital, and needs money, it may be accommodated through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, if it will sign a promissory note.

That is all there is to this bill. Let me make this clear, that no life-insurance company asked for this legislation. The thousands and hundreds of thousands of policyholders in life-insurance companies may as well be informed now as any time that no life-insurance company in this country is demanding any such kind of legislation; and it seems to me that we have come to the point where we must take pretty serious thought before we travel further in the direction we have been heading.

Up to this time whenever we have loaned money through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation we have loaned it on adequate and safe security. It has been a business proposition. Now we have come to the day when a few casualty companies come to us and say: "We have no more collateral; our capital is impaired; we need some of the people's money. We want the Government to come into this business with us. We want the Government to buy capital stock with public moneys but we will not agree to match it with cash capital in the new set-up."

The gentleman from North Carolina explained how they are going to get their capital stock. They are simply going to go out and induce those who have a claim, either actual or claimed, against the insurance company to accept preferred stock for it. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation must pay good money for its stock and insurance companies will take the money they get from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and go right back to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with it and demand the collateral they have left with it for former loans. Is it wise for us to make this possible? Of course not. When the transaction is completed the applying insurance company has as much or more of the public moneys than it had when it borrowed from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and furnished adequate and safe collateral, but the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has given up good collateral and taken preferred stock. In other words, this bill would enable insurance companies to get more of the people's money and get back collateral pledged for former loans. If the bill could be amended to compel these casualty insurance companies to match every dollar of Government money put into preferred stock with new cash capital stock of their own we could justify the passage of this bill.

In these few words in this proposed amendment I have endeavored, in my own way, to bring before the House the whole picture that is presented by this pending bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I was told by a member of the committee that it was not the intention to do any more under this bill for the insurance companies than had been done for the banking interests in the former bill and that these insurance companies will not have any money or paid-in capital stock except on the same conditions.

Mr. BEEDY. That has been stated. It has been said that is what is intended; but when we offered to test their sincerity by a cash capital-matching amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina in our committee, the amendment was not accepted.

Now, let us put such a provision right in this bill. Let us amend it here on the floor as suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina. It was the desire of the gentleman from North Carolina—and it is my desire—to insert a provision that would compel these borrowers who are to put their hands into the Government purse through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to contribute an amount of cash stock—stock for which they must pay cash—equal to the amount of stock the Government is asked to buy through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. But they said,

"We cannot do that." Of course they cannot. They have no more money. They are not going to put any new money into this new set-up. They are just going to bleed us white, and I am telling you we have just got to stop somewhere. I think this is the place to stop.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. Is there any difference as regards the solvency of an operating company if it wipes out $5,000,000 of its liabilities by preferred stock instead of securing cash?

Mr. BEEDY. Not if the liabilities it wipes out are real and not concocted for the express purpose of distributing stock allegedly to match stock paid for with good money by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. REILLY. As far as the Government is concerned, the loan is just as good, is it not?

Mr. BEEDY. Of course, we can put enough money into any company that is involved to set it up on its feet again.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes, and I am not going to speak any more on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BEEDY. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. When you wipe out $5,000,000 of the company's liability they are $5,000,000 nearer being solvent. It is just the same as though they had got that much money; there is no difference.

Mr. BEEDY. Let us be perfectly frank about the matter. When they can induce claimants and creditors to accept preferred stock they relieve themselves of the demands of those creditors.

Mr. REILLY. It is just the same as though they had secured $5,000,000 in money.

Mr. BEEDY. That is true if the claims are legitimate, but I am saying that under the terms of this bill the insurance companies themselves do not put in any new money. I am speaking about that feature.

Mr. REILLY. That is true.

Mr. BEEDY. And I call attention to the fact that we have got to decide whether it is to be an accepted obligation of this Government to rehabilitate companies which have exhausted their resources and impaired their capital stock. If that is an obligation of Government then let us go ahead with it, but then when we have taken that step and are a partner in these businesses, how shall we resist those who will come to us and say: "It is a proper function of Government to run the banks; it is a proper function of the Government to run the railroads and the insurance companies, because they are all affected with a public interest; the Government is already a partner in them and it is in the interest of the whole people that the Government take over, in their entirety, these different activities." You will find it difficult if you take this first step to refuse to take the final step. Once you start on this journey I think you will be compelled to go the whole way.

I think we ought to consider very carefully before we vote to support this bill in its present form. I shall vote against it unless the cash capital matching amendment to be offered by the gentleman from North Carolina is adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. The inference has been given out here that all these insurance companies have to do is to go in with a promissory note and walk out with the funds.

Mr. BEEDY. That is right; that is all they have to do under the provisions of section 2.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not true, I will ask the gentleman from Maine, that they have to deposit collateral, the same as the banks?

Mr. BEEDY. No; if they had collateral, they would not be asking for this legislation. They have exhausted their collateral already.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SWANK rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman, I have always believed in, worked for, and practiced economy in public office. For several years I have stated that expenses of government—Federal, State, county, city, and local—must be reduced. A few years ago we reached the point where we could not pay the increased expenses, and especially the expenses of government where the money must be derived by direct taxation. Direct taxation has now become unbearable, and even if there were no mortgages thousands of our citizens would lose their homes because they cannot pay the high taxes. As long as additional methods of raising revenue can be devised and put into effect we need not look for much reduction in public expenses. The taxes that are collected should be levied largely upon those most able to pay, but many times those who are most able to pay do not contribute anything to governmental expenses.

The gross public debt of the United States now amounts to more than $20,000,000,000, and the annual interest appropriated and paid to these nontaxable bondholders amounts to more than $600,000,000. This is one of the most outrageous provisions of our taxing system. Money can be derived when needed to loan on farms and city homes to relieve our distressed and debt-burdened citizens in other ways than by nontaxable bonds. Congress can authorize the Treasury Department to issue bonds at a small rate of interest, which will not be sold, and can be presented to the Federal Reserve Board for the issuance of Federal Reserve notes which circulate as other money. Another method of deriving these funds is for Congress to direct the Treasury Department to issue Treasury notes and appropriate the interest that has to be paid upon these nontaxable bonds, put it in a sinking fund, and retire the total issue in a certain period of years. If a man has $1,000,000 invested in 4 percent nontaxable bonds he receives an income of $40,000 per year upon which he pays no taxes. If a widow has a cheap shack that she calls home she is required to pay taxes under this system.

Our salaries are reduced 15 percent under the present law, but the real decrease is much more than that by reason of the fact that we increased income taxes which apply to these salaries. I supported this reduction and voted to reduce our salaries 25 percent. All Federal salaries have been reduced except those of the Federal judges, and those salaries should be reduced just the same as other salaries. I noticed in the papers that while these judges have been advised that they can contribute this 15 percent reduction there have been only 11 who complied with this suggestion. The annual salaries of the Federal judges are as follows:

United States Supreme Court: Chief Justice, $20,500; eight Associate Justices, at $20,000 each.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals: Forty judges, at $12,500 each.

United States district courts: One hundred and fifty-one district judges, at $10,000 each.

Court of Customs and Patent Appeals: Presiding judge and four associate judges, at $12,500 each.

Customs Court: Presiding judge and eight judges, at $10,000.

Court of Claims: Chief justice, at $12,500; four judges, at $12,500 each.

Territorial courts—Hawaii: Chief justice, at $10,500; two associate justices, at $10,000 each. Four judges of circuit courts, at $7,500 each for the first circuit, and one judge each for the second, third, fourth, and fifth circuits, at $7,000 each.

The total salary of all these judges amounts to $2,494,000.

Under the law a Federal judge may retire on full salary when he becomes 70 years of age after serving 10 years. April 1, 1933, there were 21 Federal judges retired on full pay and the total sum of their annual retirement salaries amounts to $236,000, which is $11,238 per year each on an average.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this retirement pay for Federal judges, and that law should be repealed. If such a public official who has a lifetime job, with no expense in getting the position, cannot save enough to live upon comfortably after he retires, then the people of the United States should not be taxed because he has not laid aside enough to live upon. There is no more reason, in my judgment, for retiring a Federal judge upon a salary than there is of retiring any other American citizen who has contributed his time, money, and labor to pay these salaries.

Under the present provisions of our Constitution, salaries of Federal judges cannot be reduced by taxation or otherwise, except those of district judges in Alaska, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and judges of the Court of Claims, Customs Court, and Court of Customs and Patent Appeals. In order to permit a reduction in these salaries, on the 4th day of April, 1933, I introduced House Joint Resolution 144, which proposes an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and, if adopted, the salaries of these Federal judges could be reduced the same as those of other Federal officials. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of section I, article III, of the Constitution of the United States of America the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the States.

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, when salaries are reduced, there should be no large salaries exempted, whether for Federal judges or any other officials. The laws of the United States should be so written that they will apply to all our citizens alike. This resolution should be passed by Congress and the Constitution of the United States amended so these salaries will be reduced the same as other salaries. It is not right to take all pensions and compensations from so many of our disabled soldiers and not reduce the salaries of these judges, the same as other officials.

Mr. Chairman, the cruelest piece of legislation enacted since I have been in Congress is the so-called "economy bill", or the bill that strikes so many of the disabled veterans and their dependents from the compensation rolls. Economy for whom? Instead of taking the small allowances from these soldiers, I prefer to take it from the big nontaxable bondholders who receive their allowances in the way of interest and upon which they pay no taxes. Ah, Mr. Chairman, when the boys donned their khaki jackets in 1917 and 1918 and left their jobs and their families for the World War, they were acclaimed by all, including the international bankers who reaped such a financial harvest from that war. We promised them then that the wounded and sick, their dependent widows, and little children would be cared for by a grateful people, and the people are grateful, but not the National Economy League which sponsored the bill and at whose behest it was enacted into law. The bill eliminates the allowances of a great majority of the Spanish-American veterans and the World War veterans, as well as their dependents. What have the boys done, Mr. Chairman, to cause this sort of treatment? It is more cruel and painful to them than an enemy bullet or a saber thrust. The letters that I receive from these soldiers and their wives would cause tears to come to the eyes of any man. They will be cared for. We are not going to permit the children of these boys to starve. It will be a question for the local communities to deal with, and I believe those who reaped such large financial benefits during the World War should pay taxes to help care for the sick and wounded.

The farm bill, which recently passed the House, provides for a bond issue of $2,000,000,000, the town mortgage bill $2,000,000,000 more, and the public works bill provides for a bond issue of $3,000,000,000, making a total of $7,000,000,000 of bonds bearing 4 percent interest. This will make $280,000,000 per year that Congress will have to appropriate for the pockets of these nontaxable bondholders. The Government can take these small allowances from our soldiers and give it to these nontaxable bondholders, but not with my consent. If Congress would appropriate $280,000,000 per year and put it in a sinking fund, Treasury notes or currency could be issued and the total issue of $7,000,000,000 would be retired in 25 years.

Mr. Chairman, another piece of legislation that we should enact, in my judgment, is the "bonus" bill, or the bill to pay the soldiers' adjusted-service certificates. This has to be paid and now is a good time to pay it. This money would be placed in circulation in every nook and corner of the United States and a just debt be paid. It would not increase anybody's taxes either to pay it. The Treasury Department can issue Treasury notes and pay the "bonus", or the Federal Reserve Board can issue currency against these adjusted-service certificates. There is a motion now on the Speaker's desk to discharge the committee that has this "bonus" bill in charge and bring the bill before the House for consideration. I have signed the motion and hope the bill will come before the House for consideration at this special session.

Mr. Speaker, as the days go by and as the many pitiful letters come to my office from these wounded boys and their dependents, I feel that my vote against this so-called "economy bill" is more justified than ever. I was against the bill then and I am against it now. When the bill was enacted I feared that great injustices would be done many of our soldiers and for that reason opposed the bill. I am going to keep my promise to these boys. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine if he desires to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes; I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment, Mr. Chairman. We ought to pass on the bill in toto.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 2. In the event that any such insurance company shall be incorporated under the laws of any State which does not permit it to issue preferred stock, exempt from assessment or additional liability, or if such laws permit such issue of preferred stock only by unanimous consent of stockholders, or upon notice of more than 20 days, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized for the purposes of this act to purchase the legally issued notes, bonds, or debentures of such insurance company, which may be subordinated in whole or in part or to any degree to claims of other creditors.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 10, after the word "issued", insert the word "capital" and strike out the words "notes, bonds, or debentures"; and in line 11, after the word "company", insert the words "or to make loans secured by such notes as collateral."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, there is a clerical error in the first part of the amendment. The committee amended the section by striking out the words "bonds or debentures" in lines 10 and 11, but the erasure of the word "notes" is a clerical error, and I ask unanimous consent that this correction may be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, much as I regret to so state, I am firmly of the opinion that this bill is a wolf in sheep's clothing.

We were first told that this bill was for the purpose of saving the life-insurance-policy holders of this country, a project toward which each one of us would be sympathetic.

But the fact is that this $50,000,000 is to save practically four casualty companies that are nearly, if not quite, bankrupt. The life-insurance companies, the gentleman from Maine says, and I agree with him, which number more than 300 in this country, are not demanding loans nor are they seeking this legislation. The total combined assets of the 300 life-insurance companies of this country is $20,000,000,000, of which one quarter of those assets are held by two of the large companies, the Prudential and the Metropolitan.

Why are the assets of the life-insurance companies solvent and sound? Simply because they have confined themselves to legitimate investments, paying not more than 4, 5, or 6 percent. The casualty companies have taken all sorts of risks, even including the hazardous business of insuring bank deposits.

So I say to you that the $50,000,000 is what might well be termed, as the illustrious predecessor of the man in the White House said, "a raid on the Federal Treasury."

I yield to no man in wanting to favor the life-insurance-policy holders of this country, but when it comes to taking $50,000,000—when we are making every effort to raise $220,000,000 to finance the $3,300,000,000 public-works program—I say it is little short of criminal negligence on the part of the House to enact this bill just to help four or five casualty insurance companies in this country who have taken too great a risk in gambling too much and are practically insolvent today, and cannot be saved by this $50,000,000 or another $50,000,000 added to it.

At a time like this, when we are witnessing at the other end of the Capitol the richest banker in the world sitting calmly and serenely in that body and saying that he paid no income tax for 2 years, when $250,000,000 was deposited in his bank last year, who has money enough to lease three whole floors in the luxurious Carlton Hotel, when we are straining to devise new taxes, sales tax, and gasoline taxes in order to finance the public-works program, I say that we should call a halt.

I agree with my friend from Texas when he said that this Morganism and Mellonism must come to a halt.

The people of the country have voted for a new deal. I would like to see made a public statement from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as to just how liquid the loans are that they have already made. Up until September last $213,000,000 was loaned to life-insurance companies of this country. What did they do with the money? The Union Central Life, of Cincinnati, Ohio, borrowed $16,000,000, and in the meantime sold out and confiscated the homes of thousands of farmers in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 3. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not subscribe for, purchase, or accept as collateral for a loan under this act any preferred stock, notes, bonds, or debentures of any applicant insurance company (1) until the applicant shows to the satisfaction of the Corporation that it can furnish an amount of new capital equal to that for which application is made to the Corporation, (2) if at the time of such subscription, purchase, or acceptance any officer, director, or employee of the applicant is receiving total compensation in a sum in excess of $17,500 per annum from the applicant and/or any of its affiliates, and (3) unless at such time the applicant agrees to the satisfaction of the Corporation not to increase the compensation of any of its officers, directors, or employees, and not to retire any of its stock, notes, bonds, or debentures issued for capital purposes while any part of the preferred stock, notes, bonds, or debentures of such company is held by the Corporation. For the purposes of this section, the term "compensation" includes any salary, fee, bonus, commission, or other payment, direct or indirect, in money or otherwise, for personal services.

With the following committee amendments:

Mr. STEAGALL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. STEAGALL. Before the Clerk reports the committee amendments, I rise to correct a clerical error. On page 4, in lines 14 and 15, the italicized words "what appears reasonable to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation" should be stricken out and the words "$17,500 per annum from the applicant and/or any of its affiliates" should stand.

Mr. BLANTON. Then on page 4 the language "total compensation in a sum in excess of $17,500 per annum from the applicant and/or any of its affiliates" remains.

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. So that there will be a limitation of $17,500?

Mr. STEAGALL. In that section; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman expects to strike them out on the next page?

Mr. STEAGALL. We will take that up when we get to them.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the proposed committee amendment in lines 12 and 13 will be rejected.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, beginning in line 15, strike out down to and including the word "Corporation" in line 21 and insert:

"The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not subscribe for or purchase any preferred stock or capital notes of any applicant insurance company (1) until the applicant shows to the satisfaction of the Corporation that it has unimpaired capital stock or that it will furnish new capital which will be subordinate to the preferred stock or capital notes to be purchased by the Corporation equal to the amount of said preferred stock or capital notes so purchased by the Corporation: Provided, however, That the Corporation may lend upon said capital stock, common or preferred, or capital notes, if, in its opinion, it will be adequately secured by said stock or capital notes, and/or such other forms of security as the Corporation may require."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 11, after the word "receiving", insert "from the applicant and/or any of its affiliates."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. BLANTON rose.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments close in 15 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee about the attempt of the committee on page 5, line 5, to strike out the limit of $17,500. Is the chairman going to insist on that amendment?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; that is the section in which the amendment was placed by the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. And if I understand my friend from Alabama, he is in favor of making no limitation whatever upon these big salaries?

Mr. STEAGALL. We will talk about that when we get to the question.

Mr. BLANTON. I think we ought not only to leave this language in on page 4, but we ought to leave it in on page 5.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. What position does the gentleman take on that? Is he in favor of paying $200,000 per year to one insurance president?

Mr. BEEDY. No; I am not, and I could not do it if I were in favor of it.

Mr. BLANTON. I refuse to yield further.

Mr. BEEDY. If the gentleman wants some information, I should be glad to give it to him.

Mr. BLANTON. I am in favor of using my own 5 minutes. If the gentleman is in favor of continuing to pay $100,000 to the president of the Equitable Life Insurance Co.

and $200,000 to Mr. Eckert, the president of the Metropolitan Life—

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I regret I have not the time.

Mr. LUCE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is discussing a matter to be found in the following section, which has not yet been read.

Mr. BLANTON. No; it is in this section. Mr. Chairman, in this section there is a limitation of $17,500 on line 12.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true; but that is not the amendment pending. The gentleman must speak to the pending amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report this bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] is one of the best parliamentarians in this House, and he knows sometimes how to take a man off the floor, but he has taught me how to keep the floor when I want it, and through my long association with him here I have learned from him how to keep him from taking me off the floor when I want to discuss some bad provision that his committee has brought in here in its bill for the House to pass.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I regret I have not the time. The gentleman tried to take me off the floor and I did not let him do it. If his constituents in Massachusetts, when millions of men are without jobs, when soldier boys are having their compensation cut, when disabled Spanish-American veterans are having their compensation taken away from them, are in favor of this Congress providing for the sale of $50,000,000 of bonds so that the money can be loaned to insurance companies to pay salaries to their presidents of $125,000 a year, yes, of $200,000 a year, then they are not like my constituents. They are a different kind of people.

Mr. LUCE. Is that a question?

Mr. BLANTON. No. I was giving the gentleman some information about which he should pause and reflect.

Mr. LUCE. I do not want to pause now.

Mr. BLANTON. I am giving some information to the great Committee on Banking and Currency, and it is a great committee and the chairman of it is one of my best friends, and the distinguished ranking minority member [Mr. LUCE] knows, is one of my good friends, and I would do anything in the world for him; and the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] is one of my good friends, and I would do much for him, but I am informing this committee that they cannot pass this kind of law over on the people of the country, to continue these salaries of $200,000 a year. [Applause.] We ought to kill this bill right here. [Applause.] We ought to stop it. [Applause.] If you boys will stay with us and vote, we will knock it out and stop it here. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman understands that the section under consideration at this time is section 3. In section 3 have we not incorporated a limitation on the salaries?

Mr. BLANTON. But in section 4—

Mr. STEAGALL. We have not reached that yet.

Mr. BLANTON. But you are proposing to leave it wide open, and I have no confidence in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation reducing these big salaries. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. But I am asking the gentleman if he will not wait until we get to section 4 and deal with that proposition then as the gentleman sees fit, and permit the Committee to pass on it. It is for this Committee to decide whether or not we will leave it in.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman give us time on that?

Mr. STEAGALL. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Since I have kept the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] from taking me off the floor, and since I have had a right to express my opinion about these big salaries, I am now going to ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion to strike out the enacting clause, temporarily, until we find out what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] does with the limitation in the next section. If that limitation is stricken from the bill, I shall renew this motion to strike out the enacting clause. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot place any restrictions on the withdrawal of the motion, so far as the Chair is concerned.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent to temporarily withdraw the motion.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. All right. Let us vote to kill the bill right now by striking out its enacting clause.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to debate the matter. The gentleman has stated that we can deal with it in section 4.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEAGALL) there were ayes 74 and noes 94.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. STEAGALL and Mr. BLANTON to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were ayes 91 and noes 94.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 4, line 1, to insert the amendment referred to this morning, and which I undertook to present a few minutes ago when the chairman rose to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina: On page 4, line 1, after the word "new", insert the word "cash."

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, before discussing the merits which I believe this amendment holds I wish to call to the attention of the House, and especially to those who appear so zealous regarding the placement of a limitation upon the salaries to be paid officers who serve the institutions now borrowing or which may hereafter borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, that you were about to kill your own opportunity. If the motion of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] had carried, it would have defeated the exact purpose which prompted the gentleman to present it.

Mr. Chairman, my amendment calls for the substitution of but one word. By reference to page 4, line 1, of the bill, I am suggesting that between the words "new" and "capital" the word "cash" be inserted. If this is done, the applicant companies will be required to furnish an equal amount of cash capital to that which they may receive from the Corporation. Since we are extending the privileges of the Corporation beyond its original scope and intent, it is my judgment that this requirement is entirely reasonable and consistent with the best principle involved in this legislation. It is inconceivable to me that these companies could face the Corporation in good faith to secure a loan before their private stockholders had used their own funds toward the rehabilitation of their companies. If this amendment is not adopted, I am convinced that the majority of the applicant companies will place the entire burden of new cash capital upon the Government and in no wise further involve themselves in the liabilities of their companies. The old axiom that "he who would be helped must first help himself" seems to me should apply here with full force. I recognize that meeting the requirements which this amendment will necessitate will make it more difficult to carry out the reorganizations which are proposed to be undertaken by those interested. At the same time, where a general partnership exists it is understood that each partner contributes an equal part of capital. Then, too, it should be remembered that if this legislation is justified it can be only on the basis that the rehabilitation of these companies will inure to the public welfare.

If the applicant companies are required to first make up their own part of the new capital in cash, certainly such contribution of funds will inure to the benefit of the creditors who have a first and prior lien. Each creditor will benefit in the ratio of his individual claim to the total amount of new capital supplied. All of us know that some of these companies, because of no fault of their own, are today unable to meet their claims. In other words, they have outstanding unadjusted losses and cancellations which they are unable to make good with returned premiums. My understanding is that these companies will first undertake solvency by the conversion of these claims against them into an issue of preferred stock junior to that offered to the Reconstruction Corporation. The Corporation will then get a prior claim on the assets. It will not be in the form of a secured loan, but in the form of a prior stock. Through this plan the Corporation simply occupies a prior position to other stockholders, and at the same time frees the pledged assets so as to make the companies liquid. In other words, the Reconstruction Corporation, through this process, would turn loose good assets for a doubtful investment. Is that sound business practice? Without my amendment it is probable that the Corporation would do what neither you nor I nor any well-managed business institution would do. You well know that if you had a note of mine adequately secured you would not think for a minute of releasing the security and just retaining the plain note.

To illustrate again, suppose you had the note of a corporation, well secured, and the corporation needed the security with which to operate its business and came to you and asked you to exchange the secured obligation which you held and accept in lieu thereof the same amount in preferred stock? In the ordinary course of business no man would last long financially who engaged in transactions of that kind. He would soon be a candidate by his own nomination for the asylum.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does the gentleman believe there is any justification at all in taking money away from the veterans and kicking them out in the street, and then bringing in a bill which would give $50,000,000 to insurance companies that made some "bum" guesses?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Why, certainly, I do not. But I do not consider that you have stated the facts correctly. I remind you again of my reference this morning to the rules and regulations of the Corporation with respect to aiding closed banks in reopening. I am a great believer in equal privileges to all, and in my own mind I am satisfied that unless this amendment is adopted and becomes a part of the act the insurance companies will receive special privileges and be accorded easier treatment than will our banks.

My distinguished friend from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY], in addressing Mr. BEEDY awhile ago, asked if there was any difference as regards the solvency of a borrowing company if it wipes out a portion of its liability by preferred stock instead of securing cash. I admit that in a sense there is no difference, but that is not the proposition which is before us. Surely no one here believes that the Reconstruction Corporation should be asked to contribute a sufficient amount of money to bring the assets of these companies up to the level of their liabilities. We are asked to assume that no company would apply for capital unless its assets did equal its liabilities. In the case of banks this is required, and the Corporation goes so far as to require that the bank shall not have outstanding one penny of debts beyond its deposit liabilities. I think it fair to state that the goodwill of some of the companies which are likely to be assisted if this measure becomes a law has a real, tangible value well worth preserving and saving. Personally, however, I attach very small importance to the suggestions made here today regarding certain insurance business going to foreign countries. You cannot make me believe that America is without adequate insurance companies as well fortified in their reserves as any companies which may be found on the face of the globe.

Please understand that if I did not feel that this amendment was constructive and designed for the public good I would not propose it. Personally, I hold a very friendly interest toward insurance companies, having been in former years engaged in writing all kinds of contracts. Here, however, we cannot, under any circumstances, weigh these matters on friendly scales or permit our sentiments to control our better judgment. If this amendment is adopted, as I am confident it will be, I believe the bill would be greatly improved and will satisfy the misgivings of many Members regarding its soundness. I also feel that many worthy institutions will be able, through the assistance of the Government to rehabilitate their capital and thereby meet its obligations to the individuals. The mere fact that they can show to the public that their new set-up was sound enough to invite Government participation will go a long way in restoring the confidences of the people generally in our American companies. Through this legislation, with this and other desirable amendments, it is possible to bring about this worthy accomplishment more quickly and with less cost than any other plan yet suggested during this emergency. All of us realize that extraordinary conditions such as we face today call for extraordinary legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not make, renew, or extend any loan under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, or under the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, (1) if at the time of making, renewing, or extending such loan any officer, director, or employee of the applicant is receiving compensation at a rate in excess of $17,500 per annum, and (2) unless at such time the applicant agrees to the satisfaction of the Corporation not to increase the compensation of any of its officers, directors, or employees to any amount in excess of $17,500 per annum while such loan is outstanding and unpaid. For the purposes of this section the term "compensation" includes any salary, fee, bonus, commission, or other payment, direct or indirect, in money or otherwise for personal services.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 5, line 5, strike out "$17,500 per annum" and insert "what appears reasonable to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment. Will not the gentleman from Alabama agree to waive this committee amendment and leave the $17,500 in the bill as the maximum salaries these insurance companies may pay their officials? He will secure a great many more votes for his bill if he will.

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say to the gentleman that I cannot agree to change this bill as it was reported to the committee. I am but the servant of the committee and I am standing by its action and defending it.

Mr. BLANTON. As this bill was introduced in the Senate it carried a maximum limitation of $17,500 on such salaries, and that language was stricken out in the House committee.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The change was made by a very close vote in the committee, and the chairman is not at liberty to reveal who voted for it and who voted against it.

Mr. BLANTON. What I am wondering about is why it was changed.

Mr. STEAGALL. If the gentleman will permit, I shall be glad to tell him.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The bill came from the Senate with that limitation in it.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill came from the Senate with this limitation in it. It so appealed to Senators that even they saw fit to put a limitation in here of $17,500, yet the House, which is supposed to look after the interests of the common people of America, are striking out this limitation so as to continue the payment of these $200,000 salaries.

Now, if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will pay great, big, outrageous salaries to its own employees, which it is doing right now, it certainly will approve of paying big salaries to the officers of incorporated insurance companies.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman now let me answer his question?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say to the gentleman that a Texan is in charge of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the gentleman should be more kindly in his reference to it.

Mr. BLANTON. Texas is the biggest State the gentleman ever saw.

Mr. STEAGALL. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. And there are so many men down there that they do not always agree, especially as to what shall be a maximum salary.

Mr. STEAGALL. Lots of them, including my friend.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Let me say this to the gentleman: This bill had only two sections as it was introduced in the House.

In the Senate it was amended and one of the amendments put on in the Senate was a salary limitation.

Mr. BLANTON. Here is what I want to impress on my friend from Alabama. The gentleman saw this committee a while ago come within three votes of striking out the enacting clause of this bill. Does the gentleman know why we did not get quite enough votes to strike it out? There were some Members here who thought the gentleman was going to let this limitation on salaries remain in the bill. If the gentleman does not do it, I hope that we will find three more Members on this floor who will help strike out the enacting clause. If the gentleman will allow this limitation to stay in the bill he may pass his bill. I doubt if he passes it without some restriction in the bill on these salaries.

Mr. GREEN. Oh, we want the whole insurance section stricken out of the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. This is the situation: This amendment fixing a limitation upon salaries to be paid by borrowing institutions was incorporated in the bill by the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and it ought to stay in the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. And the limitation was placed at $17,500. The House amended that provision at the first place where it was applicable so as to say that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation officials should determine whether or not a salary was in excess of a reasonable sum.

Mr. BLANTON. The limitation is in section 3, and now we want to vote down the committee amendment as to this section, so that this proper limitation on big salaries may stay in section 4.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, the Senate amended the original bill by fixing a salary limitation of $17,500 for officials of insurance companies obtaining loans and as to officials of all institutions renewing loans. The Committee on Banking and Currency was of the opinion that as to new loans or purchases made by the Corporation it was all right to fix a salary limitation of $17,500 as to officials in borrowing institutions. But in section 4 we are dealing with the matter of salaries in institutions that have already borrowed and are in debt to the Corporation under contracts already in existence. They were entered into under the original law that contained no limitation of salaries paid officials of borrowing institutions. So the committee thought that in the first instance where new loans are to be made, a salary limitation as to officials should be included, but we thought that as to borrowing institutions that are already indebted to the Corporation, it would be in moral effect interference with an existing contractual relationship if we attempted to disturb the status that existed at the time the original loans were made. So it was provided that as to extensions of existing loans, the Corporation officials would determine whether or not salaries paid to officials in a borrowing institution were in excess of a reasonable sum.

This is all there is to this matter, and it is for the Committee to decide whether they think this limitation saying that what sum is reasonable for salaries should be passed upon by the Corporation officials or whether we should restore the limitation of $17,500, or any other sum that the Committee may see fit. The matter is left for decision by the Members of this Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, the gentleman's position is that where we have already loaned to insurance companies large sums of money, that are paying $200,000 salaries to their presidents, if they want some more money the gentleman is perfectly willing for them to come back and get $50,000,000 more without putting any limitation whatever on the salaries paid.

Mr. STEAGALL. No; quite the contrary. The specific limitation applies to new loans, but it does not apply to existing loans or the renewal of existing loans.

Mr. BLANTON. I think we ought to vote down this committee amendment, and I do not think the gentleman will object very much.

Mr. STEAGALL. I cannot agree with the gentleman about that.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment and call your attention to the first section of the bill, which states the emergency under which we are considering this legislation.

In this connection I want to read you a statement of the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation appearing in the Wichita Falls Record News of May 22. This is a statement by Mr. Jones, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The article is headed "Extreme Crisis Is Passed", and is as follows:

"Reports to Washington from the loan agencies throughout the country", Jones said, "substantiate both of these conclusions, a clear indication that the period of extreme gravity is behind us."

Therefore, the preamble of the bill stating that it is an existing emergency under which we are supposed to consider this legislation, is not in fact recognized by those who are to administer this act under the provisions of the bill.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] yesterday placed in the RECORD the names of two insurance companies who with their affiliates seem to be in great distress and want help under the provisions of this bill.

I have in my hand here a photostatic copy of the financial report, showing the financial status of those companies.

The Globe & Rutgers Fire Insurance Co. report shows that the capital stock is $7,000,000. In the statement they say that the salaries, rents, and so forth, the company paid in 1931 were $2,619,166.

I am wondering how much was paid to the president and the higher officials of the company. The Internal Revenue Department has the information, but they have refused to give it to Members of Congress, yet we are sitting here trying to pass legislation without this necessary information.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does the gentleman say that this company with $7,000,000 capital paid $2,600,000 in salaries?

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes; last year.

Now, the National Surety Co. reports a capital stock of $15,000,000.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. I should like to ask the gentleman if that company borrowed money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes; the National Surety Co. mentioned yesterday by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] borrowed $400,000 in January 1933, according to the report filed March 1, 1933, with the Banking and Currency Committee by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Now, quoting from the report of the National Surety Co., as I say, the capital stock was $15,000,000. In 1931 they paid for salaries, rents, administration expenses, and so forth, $3,507,993.

Now, the Senate put a provision in this bill limiting the salaries paid to officials to $17,500.

Mr. BLANTON. If we vote down both committee amendments we will limit the salaries to $17,500.

Mr. McFARLANE. I have an amendment prepared here that I think we should adopt in any event, limiting the salaries under which all officers coming to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to secure a loan shall be limited.

Mr. BLANTON. We can do it by voting down the committee amendments.

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes; we want to vote down the committee amendments, and then strike out sections 1, 2, and 3 of the bill.

Mr. GREEN. I hope we will fix it so that we will knock out the insurance feature.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think in our desire to economize that we have probably lost sight of the effect that the amendment will have to write back into this bill this limitation upon the salaries to be paid to officers of corporations seeking aid from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I hold no brief whatever for the president or the executive of any bank or insurance company receiving $100,000 a year salary. I believe that what constitutes a fair salary should be left to the discretion of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I do not think this House should limit the amount to be paid. To do so would destroy the effectiveness of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation immediately. So it is logical to leave to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, within its discretion, this question of what they consider a reasonable amount. Let me give you something of the history of this affair. This matter was brought up in committee. We had Jesse Jones, the chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, before our committee, and we asked him to make a recommendation. He made the recommendation, and his recommendation was that this salary should not be in excess of what might appear to be reasonable to the President of the United States. Some of us did not believe that we should further delegate legislative powers to the Executive, and we objected strenuously to that. I remember one question which was put to Mr. Jones. One of the members of the committee was astounded that the President should ask for that authority. He said:

Mr. Jones, do you mean to say that the President of the United States wants authority to regulate the salaries paid by borrowers from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

And he replied:

Gentlemen of the committee, I would not ask for that if I had not conferred with the President.

The President, therefore, wanted the authority himself to set these salaries. We did not think that we should delegate that power to the President, and as a compromise we agreed that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should set the salaries.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman mean to say by his argument that he would decline to grant that authority to the President of the United States and at the same time grant it to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes; because we feel that the Chief Executive of this Nation should not be bothered with these details.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. And the gentleman says that the President wants that?

Mr. WOLCOTT. He wants this authority to set these salaries, either in himself or in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I am glad of every opportunity I can go along with the President of the United States in worthwhile legislation. If you men over there are as zealous as I am over here in my desire to go along with him on worthwhile legislation, you will vote to retain this amendment.

Mr. McFARLANE. Did the gentleman get this information direct from the President that he wants this authority?

Mr. WOLCOTT. We got it through Mr. Jones who said that the President wanted it and he conferred with the President before asking for it. So if you want to vote with the President of the United States you vote to accept the committee amendment. If you do not want to vote with the President of the United States, vote to eliminate it.

HIGH OFFICIALS OF BANKRUPT CORPORATIONS ASKING GOVERNMENT AID SHOULD NOT GET $200,000 SALARIES

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I happen to be a new Member, and I want to speak to the new Members. You men know that when you were sent down here by the people to Congress you were sent here by the common people and not by the bankers—that is, the great majority of you. That is why you are here. I see some of my colleagues from Michigan. I have heard most of you speak before election and you all said that you would come down here and defend the rights of the people; that you would legislate in their behalf; and now my good friend from Michigan [Mr. Wolcott] wants to ask Jesse Jones, the head of the bankers, what salary we are going to fix as the pay for these men who are at the head of corporations asking Government aid. If you go back to our State and say that you voted in favor of continuing salaries of $200,000 to insurance officials and railroad officials and all other officials, while your folks are back there starving, you will not be back here to vote again in another Congress. They sent you down here to legislate. They did not send you down here from Michigan to have Mr. Jones and Mr. Morgan or any of the other bankers tell you what to do. That is the trouble. The bankers have been legislating for years. I propose to use my own discretion. I am responsible. Whether I come back or not is my funeral and not Mr. Jones'. [Applause.]

BANKERS CRY ON J. P. MORGAN'S SHOULDER

Think of the audacity of Mr. Morgan going before a committee and saying that he did not make any money, while at this very minute he is maintaining three complete floors in the Carlton Hotel, with private cooks and valets, so that his stomach will not be upset by this investigation they are having over there. I say that you are the direct representatives of the people. We do not have to go to Jesse Jones or anybody else for a recommendation. Members of Congress are individually responsible for their vote. If a company is in such position that it has to borrow millions of dollars to keep going, it has no business to pay its officials $200,000 a year salary. We have a Vice President of the United States who is devoting every minute of the day to the welfare of the country, to keep it from bankruptcy, and he gets only $15,000 a year. Of course, if you want to vote to continue this $200,000 a year salary, do it, and I hope that we will have a roll call on this bill. [Applause.]

With the consent of the House, I am offering the following information concerning salaries paid to high officials in corporations. The following salaries are just a few, and

J. W. Stedman, vice president.....	43,000	43,000
J. K. Gore, vice president.....	43,000	43,000

The President of the Missouri Pacific Railroad, which borrowed over $27,000,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, was drawing a salary of $85,416 from the company until it was cut to $40,000 by a Federal judge just this month. At the same time the vice president was cut from $40,000 to $19,000 per year.

In addition to President Baldwin's salary of $80,000 from the Missouri Pacific, he was drawing $12,700 a year as chairman of the board of the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad and $6,000 a year as President of the Missouri Transportation Co., making his yearly salary in excess of $100,000 a year. And President Baldwin is not the exception among big corporation executives.

I know that the common people of this country, who are demanding a minimum wage of $15 per week, will cry over the sad plight of these corporations.

Section 4 of Senate bill 1094 provides that no corporation seeking aid from the Government shall pay its officials over $17,500 per year. Our House committee now recommends that this be amended, and to allow the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to fix their salaries. This is wrong. Corporations claiming Government aid and loans of large sums of money have no business paying their officials these exorbitant salaries. It was these same corporation officials who were demanding "economy" and who forced the Government employee to take a 15-percent cut on his small salary, and who forced the unconscionable cuts on war veterans, who now cry out against cutting their unearned large salaries. And lo and behold, in the very Halls of Congress this afternoon, we have heard Members of Congress take up their wail and join them in their weeping.

LARGE SALARIES MAKE HIGH RATES

In paying these large salaries to themselves these officials raise your rates of insurance, make your railroad fares higher, and increase the cost of goods they manufacture, if they are in the manufacturing business, and deprive stockholders of dividends.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think there is a great deal of uncertainty over this particular aspect of the question which we are considering now.

There are entirely two different classes of borrowers from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or perhaps I should say two classes of those who are taking advantage of the facilities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Our first step in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was to make loans to banks, insurance companies, and railroads. It was only recently that we got into the business of bolstering up the capital structure, first of banks and then of insurance companies, through assistance from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation resources.

There is quite a difference in a company coming to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and asking for money to bolster up its capital structure, in other words, to put money behind the company so that it may go ahead with business, and the original idea of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which was to act as a bank, because of the fact that banking facilities in the country had broken down. Are we quite keeping faith with the borrowers from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation who have found it impossible to pay immediately the sums they have borrowed? Are we keeping faith with them when they have treated this as a bank, to ask that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation do more than any good banker would do under the circumstances? A good banker, when a borrower comes in to borrow, says to the borrower, "Your overhead is too much. Your salaries are too high. You must cut your operating costs so much."

Gentlemen, you cannot consider every corporation under one rule of thumb. You cannot say that one corporation which may be a small one in some country district should be treated the same as one of our great railroad corporations which has ramifications all over the country. Is it not better to leave it to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as a good banker to handle this in the way a good banker would handle his borrowers? Let them say, "We will decide what the salaries shall be and what the overhead shall be", instead of trying to make a rule of thumb. Why should we pick $17,500 instead of $2,500 or $5,000, or some other figure? Is it not better to let the organization in charge of the matter settle each case as it comes up?

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. How does the gentleman reconcile that line of thought with the proposition of the record made in the past, when we know they have used such bum judgment in the past in passing on loans?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I do not know what particular loan the gentleman is referring to.

Mr. McFARLANE. Well, the Missouri-Pacific loan and the Dawes loan. I could name a dozen others.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Does the gentleman know how much of the Dawes loan has been repaid?

Mr. McFARLANE. Some gentlemen said about $30,000,000; but I know how much was loaned, and I know there is about twenty-five or thirty million dollars lost in connection with that loan. Will the gentleman deny that?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I deny that absolutely.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman asks, Why should we limit salaries to a maximum of $17,500?—intimating that it is an arbitrary maximum. That is approximately the salary that a distinguished Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States receives. It is approximately the salary which the distinguished Minister of this country to the renowned Court of St. James's receives.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Allow me to answer the gentleman in this way, that the Government has never properly paid its best employees.

Mr. BLANTON. It is approximately the salary which a Cabinet officer of the United States Government receives. We fixed it according to the salary which the very best talent we could get in the Nation receives. We get the best talent for Cabinet officers, the Ambassadors, and Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, do we not?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Permit me to say in answer to the gentleman that salaries are fixed by the law of supply and demand. The gentleman may object and others may object to salaries of more than $17,500 being paid. They are paid, however, and it is true that in order to be able to get proper men to operate some of the great organizations in this country, greater salaries than that must be paid, and if we are not able to continue those salaries we will be in the position of having Reconstruction Finance Corporation money invested in corporations which are losing their best men so that second-rate men may be going ahead trying to operate these corporations.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman says that salaries are fixed by the law of supply and demand. Supply and demand is what they demand, and what we supply, when they demand that we supply them with public money to pay their presidents a salary of $200,000 per year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] has expired.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I have a substitute amendment on the Clerk's desk which I ask be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KELLER: Page 5, line 5, after the word "of", strike out the erasure lines and restore "$17,500 per annum"; and strike out all of line 6 and the word "Corporation" in line 7; and in line 10 strike out the erasure lines and restore "$17,500"; and strike out the words in italics in lines 10 and 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman, but the amendment offered by the gentleman is not a substitute, because it attempts to strike out something that has not been adopted. That language is now in the bill and the committee amendment seeks to strike it out. That amendment is pending now.

Mr. KELLER. Then I understand a vote "aye" is to strike out "$17,500"?

The CHAIRMAN. It is already in the bill. That is what the committee amendment seeks to do.

Mr. BLANTON. So we want to vote down the committee amendment.

Mr. KELLER. I desire to be recognized, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, a few minutes ago I voted not to strike out the enacting clause for this special reason: In section 4 of this bill we have an opportunity to get exactly what the Progressives, as we call ourselves sometimes, want; that is, a real, straight vote on whether we are going to cut out this salary abuse or not. I am for cutting out the salary abuse. I believe this House is for it. The truth of the matter is it has been one of the disgraces of the business of our country, and of our income-tax department and our income-tax laws that have permitted and are now permitting men to draw salaries of even 20 times what the President of the United States is getting.

All of you who have followed these matters know that this is true. It is time we called a halt on it, for when great corporations come here and say that they do not make anything for the actual reason that they paid out these amounts of money in salaries and bonuses we ought to waken to the fact that that is the sore spot. We ought to strike at the heart of this abuse. We should fix the maximum salary at $17,500. Better men, abler men than those who are getting a million or more a year in salaries and bonuses and other robberies of the business they control are working around these same greedy pigs for a small part often of the $17,500 we propose here. These outrageous premiums are not paid because of ability or character or service, but because of their unfair control of the stock of their companies. Then when these people come down here to get the renewals of their loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the Board will be compelled to say, if their officers are receiving more than $17,500 per annum, that if the company wants to get its loan renewed the company officers and directors must reduce their salaries to not exceed this amount.

The bill before us is to be a part of Reconstruction Finance Corporation law.

Now, I desire to ask a series of questions of the chairman of this Banking and Currency Committee.

My recollection is that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is simply a revamping of the War Finance Corporation of war time and for the recovery of business after the panic of 1921. Is this correct?

Mr. STEAGALL. That is true. It is predicated upon the former War Finance Corporation Act.

Mr. KELLER. And it is doing exactly the same thing now which the War Finance Corporation did then, only on a much larger scale?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; on a larger scale.

Mr. KELLER. Notwithstanding the cheating and defrauding that was carried on at that time by the men who controlled the War Finance Corporation, what was the financial result of the War Finance Corporation? Did that Corporation pay back all the money into the Treasury which it received from the Government? Did the people lose anything?

Mr. STEAGALL. The War Finance Corporation made a profit of many millions of dollars. I hesitate to name the amount.

Mr. KELLER. Did it not in fact not only pay back all the money the Government advanced to it but also a net profit of $60,000,000?

Mr. STEAGALL. Something like that.

Mr. KELLER. If the present Corporation does its business as it ought to, handling so much more money than the War Finance Corporation handled, it ought to pay much more net profit back to the people when it is closed up?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; it certainly should.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. Section 4 will apply to all corporations, will it not?

Mr. KELLER. Yes, sir; it will.

Mr. PATMAN. I hope the gentleman will make it plain that under existing law it does not apply to banking or to railroads. However, if section 4 becomes a law, then when the railroad loans and the banking loans, and these other loans fall due and application is made for their renewal, this salary feature will apply.

Mr. KELLER. Exactly so. That is the reason I voted as I did, so as to get a chance to provide for that very thing.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman stated that the War Finance Corporation made $60,000,000. Did that amount include the millions they made out of the farmer by fixing the price of his wheat at $2.20 a bushel?

Mr. KELLER. No; that does not enter into it, of course.

Mr. HOEPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. HOEPEL. Would the gentleman care to state how many millions of men were unemployed during the time the War Finance Corporation was in operation?

Mr. KELLER. It ran as high as 5,000,000 men at one time, but not more.

Mr. HOEPEL. I did not think there were any unemployed at that time.

Mr. KELLER. Yes; a report by Secretary of Commerce, Hon. Herbert Hoover, made of that in the early part of 1922 showed 5,000,000 men in enforced idleness.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I am wondering if the gentleman would not see fit to emphasize this fact, that a vote "no" on the committee amendment will allow the heads of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to say to the heads of the insurance companies and railroad companies, whose executives are getting $200,000 or $300,000 a year, "We cannot help you unless the salaries of your executives are cut down to $17,500 a year."

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman is correct. That is exactly what I am driving at.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. In order to do this the Member should vote "no" on the committee amendment?

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman is right.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SEARS. What is pending before the committee, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. There are pending two committee amendments in respect of the salary limitation of $17,500.

Mr. SEARS. After the next speech I shall make the point of order that all debate on these amendments has closed under the rules of the House.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee, I want to inform as to the exact situation in order that all may vote understandingly.

There came to us from the Senate a measure comprising numerous changes in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, a dozen or so in number. A motion to strike out the enacting clause will destroy all these proposals if it succeeds. If, however, the pending matter is settled by direct and immediate vote, then the remaining sections of the bill, which are of much importance, may survive, or may not.

We have now provided that for the four or five surety companies which are the only companies likely to take advantage of section 3, salaries shall not be more than $17,500 a year.

In the Senate there was inserted a provision extending far beyond the scope of the original measure, providing that no corporation in the United States might be allowed to borrow or renew loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation if it paid any salaries of more than $17,500.

There came before us the chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Mr. Jesse Jones, of Texas, and he expressed a sentiment which I am sure was echoed by every member of the committee, that many salaries are too large. Nobody contests that. It is desirable that they shall be reduced.

The proposal before us is one that reminds me of the legendary bed of Procrustes, where they laid the victim and cut off his head or his feet if he were longer than the bed, or if he were shorter than the bed, stretched him out to match the bed.

The iron-clad rule of $17,500 would work a great deal of harm if kept in the precise shape in which it came from the Senate. So we consulted with Mr. Jones as to what we should do, and I would corroborate what the gentleman from Michigan said of that discussion, in spite of the fact that I dislike to refer to the President on this floor. I would modify slightly the emphasis that the gentleman from Michigan gave to his statement, for as I understood it, the President averred himself to be willing to undertake this duty, and as it is a very unpleasant duty, naturally, the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was willing that the President should do it; but when we thought of that anxious, troubled, burdened man in the White House, with the great responsibilities of the Nation and of the world on his shoulders, it seemed to us unwise to expose him to the pressure that would be brought by the corporations of the country to save their pay rolls, and we found that the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, if the President was not to do it, was willing to undertake the task.

I think we have a very capable man at the head of this institution. I believe that he understands the spirit and temper of the House and of the people. He told us that he thought these salaries were too large and as far as one man may give assurance of his intentions and purposes, he gave us assurance that the purpose of the House would be carried out; and what we are asking you to do today is to allow him to apply the rule as in his judgment may seem wisest. He may be expected to require salary reductions to the point where a corporation will not be embarrassed—and when you embarrass a railroad corporation you embarrass the users of the railroad, you increase the dangers of travel if you do not have the best administrator you can find, and so it is with every type of corporation—unless you get the best man that can be secured you do the public and yourselves injury.

So I ask you to leave this to Mr. Jones and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. CELLER: Page 5, line 5, strike out "$17,500" and insert "$25,000"; page 5, line 10, strike out "$17,500" and insert "$25,000."

The question was taken and the substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LUCE) there were—ayes 115, noes 73.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the preferential motion that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the Committee has voted on that identical motion.

Mr. BLANTON. But the Committee has transacted some business since then.

The CHAIRMAN. Two amendments have been adopted since that motion was last made. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 75, noes 115.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 10, strike out "$17,500 per annum" and insert "what appears reasonable to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON and Mr. McFARLANE) there were—ayes 121, noes 65.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. The first sentence in section 201 (a) of such act, as amended, which follows paragraph (6) thereof is hereby amended by striking out the period at the end of such sentence and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "except that for the purposes of clause (b) of paragraph (6) of this subsection a project shall be deemed to be self-liquidating if the construction cost thereof will be returned by any means, including taxation, within a reasonable period, not exceeding 20 years: Provided, That nothing contained in sections 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 of this act shall apply to any area, except the area defined in the first sentence of paragraph 6 of section 201 (a) of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, as amended.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the proviso beginning in line 12, page 7.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SABATH: Page 7, line 12, strike out the proviso which reads: "Provided, That nothing contained in sections 5, 6, 8, and 9 of this act shall apply to any area except the area defined in the first sentence of paragraph 6 of section 201 (a) of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, as amended."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, there are many of you who are in favor of the bill because it seeks to amend section 201 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, which would make possible loans to States and municipalities and to eliminate certain provisions under which no loans were made as originally intended by the House by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The proviso that I have moved to strike out refers only to matters pertaining to the California situation.

I am willing that the provision that will relieve the situation in California should be adopted, but why should we restrict municipalities in all other States from being authorized to receive money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation? The securities of these municipalities are good, and loans will be repaid, every dollar.

When I originally advocated the passage of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act it was because I believed that it was going to give rise to employment and relieve the existing conditions. I want to read to you the title of the act that we passed in January 1932. It was—

To provide emergency financing facilities for financial institutions, to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry, and for other purposes.

So far no relief has been given to commerce or industry of the United States. All the loans that have been made, with a few exceptions, are loans to the railroad companies, to the banks, and to the insurance companies, and now we come in with this bill to increase loans to insurance companies.

We amended that act in July 1932, and that was to relieve the destitution. The title of the act of July 1932 was "To relieve the destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by providing for and expediting public works."

I say now that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has failed to provide or extend any credit or relief for the purposes that were originally contemplated in the legislation that was passed, though I have reasons to believe that under the new management the Government will be protected and deserving applications for loans will receive consideration and those not deserving will be rejected.

But I am of the opinion that if this bill is passed in its present form it will only aid four or five casualty companies. It will not help construction, because, as I pointed out early in the afternoon, the public works bill that will come in tomorrow precludes the making of any loans provided in the bill we are now considering.

So these provisions are nothing but gestures and inserted merely to get votes for the insurance loans that gentlemen are interested in.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], as he has suggested, will have very little time within which to be operative. If the legislation coming before this House tomorrow should be enacted into law, the activities contemplated in this amendment will be taken over by another organization. In view of the situation that exists, there will be no objection to the amendment on the part of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That an act entitled "An act to provide emergency financing facilities for financial institutions, to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry, and for other purposes", approved January 22, 1932, and amended by an act approved July 21, 1932, be further amended by adding at the end of section 5 thereof the following: "Provided further, That the Corporation may make said loans to trustees of railroads which proceed to reorganize under section 77 of the Bankruptcy Act of March 3, 1933."

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SHOEMAKER: Page 7, line 17, strike out all of section 10.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, we have been financing some of these railroad companies and pouring money into this bottomless hopper for a number of months, and here we find in this section 10 in line 22, the following:

Provided further, That the Corporation may make loans to trustees of railroads which proceed to reorganize under section 77 of the Bankruptcy Act of March 3, 1933.

We are not satisfied with trying to finance going concerns in distress, but we want to finance receivers of bankrupt organizations.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Does the gentleman understand that under the existing law it is permissible to make loans to receivers of railroads, but since the passage of the bankruptcy bill of March 3, 1933, instead of having receivers, those in charge of railroad properties appointed by the courts are trustees, and this provision only extends the right to lend to trustees who occupy the same position as receivers would before the passage of the bankruptcy act. It should also be noted that the present Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has requested this clarifying amendment.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. That is the very thing that I am opposed to, whether it happens to be a receiver or a trustee. Our farmers are going bankrupt all over the country. Their homes are being taken from them. Workingmen's homes are being taken from them. Nobody steps in to give those receivers money out of the Treasury of the United States to save their property.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. To remedy the situation the gentleman complains of, he would have to go back and have Congress repeal the original act of January 1932, and later amended by an act approved July 21, 1932.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I don't see any reason why this Corporation should exist any longer. Everybody is going bankrupt. It is not helping anybody but the big insurance companies and financial institutions and railroad companies at the expense of the taxpayer. Every day we are appropriating more money and issuing more tax-free bonds for the people to pay interest on. We are not going to alleviate this situation by perpetuating a system of appropriating more money. Yesterday it was $150,000,000, and today it is another $50,000,000, and if we keep on for another 30 days we will not have to come back here at all.

We will not have any Government. The people will take it into their own hands and the Congress of the United States will be out on the streets along with the 16,000,000 unemployed, and the veterans that have their feet sticking through their shoes. We may as well turn the entire Government over to Morgan and give him keys to the Capitol and say that we are done, and let him run the rest of the show.

He is now here in the very Capitol, and we would not even have to pay mileage to bring him here to get the keys; give him the rest of the Government bag and boodle. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the membership of the House that this bill represents the purpose of the administration to carry on a comprehensive war against this depression and to accomplish relief for every section and for every class of citizenship in the United States. If this bill did not represent that purpose it would not be before this body this afternoon and I would not be taking your time at this moment. I hope the House will not turn aside from the course upon which we have embarked in support of this administration in the stupendous task that has fallen to its hands, but that we shall go forward waging the battle on every front until we have accomplished the purpose of this extraordinary session to start forces that will ultimately bring complete economic recovery in the United States. [Applause.] That is the purpose of this legislation. The references to what is going on at the other end of the Capitol, as well as many other references and suggestions that have been made here, though they spring from the highest purposes, with which all Members of this House are in accord, have no legitimate bearing on this legislation or its purposes. This administration is entitled to continue the use of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in this struggle. It was used on a large scale by the former administration. To terminate its activities or withdraw its support now would be unjust to the administration and hazardous to its program. [Applause.]

I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 11. As used in this act the term "insurance company" shall include any corporation engaged in the business of insurance, irrespective of the nature thereof, and operating under the supervision of a State superintendent or department of insurance in any of the States of the United States.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 3, after the word "insurance", insert the words "or in the writing of annuity contracts."

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I should like the chairman of the committee to explain the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. STEAGALL. It is simply to extend the provisions of this act, as far as it may be done, to all insurance companies. There are insurance companies who write annuity contracts, and there is no reason why, in the judgment of the committee, they should not be included in the provisions of this act. That is the purpose of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 12. Section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized and empowered to make loans to any State insurance fund established or created by the laws of any State for the purpose of paying or insuring payment of compensation to injured workmen and those disabled as a result of disease contracted in the course of their employment, or to their dependents. As used in this paragraph, the term 'State' includes the several States and Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HOLLISTER: Page 8, line 11, after the word "loan", insert the words "if adequately secured."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, that language should have been printed in the bill. It was adopted in the committee.

Mr. STEAGALL. It is merely a clerical error, and I hope the House will correct it.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

My colleague, I would not feel that I had performed my full duty to the constituency which I try to represent if I did not voice final disapproval of the Congress of the United States once more contributing indirectly in this case $50,000,000 to large corporations which pay their officials as high as $175,000 per year.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman is not speaking to the amendment.

Mr. GREEN. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that. I do not intend to use all of the 5 minutes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I insist on the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GREEN. Large corporations paying $175,000 a year to the officers of such corporations. I hope my colleagues will think over this matter in a serious, personal manner. How can a corporation official honestly earn twice as much as is paid the President of the United States. The corporations should pro rate profits to their stockholders and, in case of insurance companies, to their policyholders, instead of the officers gobbling it up in high salaries.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order. The gentleman is not speaking to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida must confine himself to the amendment.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. There cannot possibly be any objection to the amendment. I must ask the gentleman to address himself to the amendment.

Mr. GREEN. I know at times facts seem harsh. If the Clerk will please read the amendment, I will confine myself to it.

There being no objection, the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. GREEN. Very well. "Adequately secured." [Laughter.] My colleagues, do you believe that the corporations that will borrow this $50,000,000 can give adequate security? They have borrowed an enormous amount. We are informed by those high in official circles that the purpose of this $50,000,000 loan is to enable those corporations to pay a portion of which they have already borrowed. In conscience, when our people are unemployed and when ex-service men are given a dollar a day to work in the forests—

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I insist the gentleman is not speaking to the amendment. I insist that he confine himself to the amendment. The amendment provides that loans secured from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should be adequately secured. I ask that the gentleman confine himself to that limitation.

Mr. GREEN. I will try my best to do so, because the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has not, I fear, confined itself to ample security in disposing of $2,800,000,000. [Applause.] My friends, it is ridiculous—I am sincere in this—when we are about to give $50,000,000 more to these same corporations, when our people are in destitution—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 13. Section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized and empowered to make loans if adequately secured to any fund created by any State for the purpose of insuring the repayment of deposits of public moneys of such State or any of its political subdivisions in banks or depositories qualified under the law of such State to receive such deposits. Such loans may be made at any time prior to January 23, 1934, and upon such terms and conditions as the Corporation may prescribe; except that any fund which receives a loan under this paragraph shall be required to assign to the corporation, to the expense of such loan, all amounts which may be received by such fund as dividends or otherwise from the liquidation of any such bank or depository in which deposits of such public moneys were made. As used in this paragraph, the term 'State' includes the several States and Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico."

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, in line 7, on page 9, I am quite certain the word "expense" is a misprint for the word "extent." I ask unanimous consent to substitute the word "extent" for the word "expense."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I have offered an amendment, and I desire to know whether the gentleman from Alabama is asking unanimous consent or whether he moved to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not put the motion, pending the gentleman's amendment.

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KVALE: Page 9, line 13, after the word "Rico", at the end of section 13, add a new section, to read as follows:

"Sec. 14. Section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized to make loans to any municipality or municipal subdivision of any State for the purposes of furnishing food, clothing, shelter, fuel, medical attention, or other direct relief to poor persons residing in such municipality or municipal subdivision, such loans to be secured by the pledge of the bonds or certificates of indebtedness of such municipality or municipal subdivision, and the said Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized to submit proposals and/or bids for the purchase of such bonds or certificates of indebtedness from such municipality or municipal subdivision and to otherwise comply with the laws of any State relating to the issuance and sale of such bonds or certificates of indebtedness, and the interest to be charged such municipality or municipal subdivision on such loans or on such bonds or certificates of indebtedness shall not exceed the rate of five (5) percent per annum."

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I shall not consume the 5 minutes on this amendment. My reason for offering the amendment is to make sure that the action of the committee upon the Sabbath amendment which strikes out the proviso in section 9 and applies to the operation under section 7, will make unnecessary my amendment.

The chairman of the committee knows the delegation from one of the large cities in my State has been in consultation with him. He knows of the need for such an amendment.

If I can have the assurance that my amendment will be unnecessary in view of the committee's earlier action, I shall be glad to ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

Mr. STEAGALL. If I understand the purport of the gentleman's amendment the purpose is accomplished by the Sabbath amendment, but I may say to the gentleman that neither his amendment nor the Sabbath amendment will probably be effective very long for the reason that under legislation now contemplated the activities to which the gentleman refers in his amendment will be transferred to another administration of the Government. That is what is in contemplation at this time.

I may say also we recently passed a $500,000,000 relief bill, and an administration has been set up for the purpose of handling this very fund which is empowered to do everything contemplated by the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. KVALE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The emergency relief bill will take care of about 30 percent of the immediate acute needs out there, and that is why I am interested in seeing that this amendment which I offer, or some similar amendment, will take care of the acute need until the new legislation can be brought into operation.

Mr. STEAGALL. I think that would.

Mr. KVALE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FULLER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies, pursuant to House Resolution 156, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the twin amendments of the committee, the first one beginning in line 5, page 5, and the other one beginning in line 10, of page 5, and being identical amendments dealing with the same subject matter. I ask unanimous consent that we may vote on them in block in order to save time.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in block.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to consider the two committee amendments on page 5 in block. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 5, strike out "$17,500 per annum" and insert "what appears reasonable to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation;".
Page 5, line 10, the same amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division, and pending that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The Committee divided; and there were—ayes 128, noes 74. So the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill, S. 1094, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON and Mr. McFARLANE) there were—ayes 147, noes 96.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 203, nays 137, not voting 90, as follows:

ALFRED E. SMITH AND THE REPEAL OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest on Monday evening to the radio appeal of the State chairman of my party, exhorting the voters of New York to register conclusively their opinion for the repeal of the prohibition amendment. As the speaker proceeded with his appeal I listened intently for him to pay at least a word of most deserved tribute to that man who has done more than any other person to bring about the magnificent triumph of liberalism and sanity that took place yesterday in the State of New York.

I was disappointed when the able chairman passed completely over the name of Alfred E. Smith. I have deep respect for the sincerity and industry of our chairman, as I have for our able President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. Nevertheless, I am convinced, as is the vast majority of our citizens, that without the unceasing efforts, without the transcendent ability of Alfred E. Smith, we would never have reached the pinnacle of victory that became ours yesterday; and on the eve of victory, nothing would have been more fitting than to acknowledge the splendid role that this great man played in the course of events leading up to the wonderful climax.

The whole life of Alfred E. Smith has been spent in an endeavor to make secure the voice of the people. We have only to scan his public record to find an unbroken sequence of labor for the common weal, toward the making secure of toleration.

When prohibition became a law in 1919 the developing events thereafter aided the country in recognizing the rare ability of Alfred E. Smith, and he was raised to a position of national prominence. As a pioneer in the cause of toleration, he was instrumental in inserting in the State Democratic platform of 1918 a plank calling for a State referendum submitting the question of prohibition to the voters of New York. Here was evidence of a characteristic that has intrenched him deeply in the hearts of the masses. From the beginning, his attitude on prohibition, as on all other public questions, has been clear-cut, well-defined, unequivocal. He has never parried, never straddled, never curried political preferment through ambiguous policies.

In the election of 1920 he temporarily sacrificed his political career because he preferred to be honest, open, and frank when hedging would have assured him of victory at the polls. In 1922 he returned to the Governorship of the State, called back by the voters when the far-seeing predictions he had made regarding the detestable State enforcement law, the Mullan-Gage Act, came true. His political foresight was paid tribute to in the fact that the same legislature which had passed the Mullan-Gage Act voted for its repeal three years later. In the same year, following his leadership, the Democratic State Convention inserted a plank in its platform favoring an amendment to the Volstead Act permitting the States, under certain restrictions and after popular referendum, to permit traffic in light wines and beer, and the voters of the State supported him overwhelmingly.

In 1926, as a result of his leadership, the referendum as to what should be the attitude of the State regarding modification of the Volstead Act, carried by more than a million votes. In 1928 the Nation witnessed the event of his famous telegram to the National Democratic Convention, advising them, when they had failed to include a liquor plank in their platform, that if selected to carry the banner of democracy in the ensuing campaign, he would do so only on condition that his views on the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment be made a part thereof. This splendid gesture of unselfishness was made to allow the convention to select another candidate, if they were unwilling to support him on this stand—in a word, refusing the greatest honor the Nation can bestow on one of its citizens unless he were permitted to make known in definite, clear, honest language his stand on the question of prohibition.

As a last milestone, no one need be reminded of the part Alfred E. Smith played in committing the Democratic Party at the last election away from a policy of ambiguity and evasion to a definite, honest, open stand for repeal.

Ladies and gentlemen, I would be shirking my duty to my constituents if I did not rise today and pay tribute to that great leader of men, Alfred E. Smith, for his magnificent efforts to repeal the Eighteenth Amendment.

UNJUST ECONOMY

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the comprehensive and carefully prepared plans of the President for the relief of the distress occasioned by the economic situation have had my enthusiastic support, and it is my belief that no Executive in our history has met such a grave condition with more courage and determination than Franklin D. Roosevelt. I particularly admire his candor and his frankness. He has admitted that in this emergency experimental legislation is necessary, and I trust and believe that he will be quick to acknowledge errors when they are made by some of those persons to whom he has intrusted administration of some of the recently enacted laws.

I firmly believe that serious errors in judgment have been made by the officials of the Veterans' Administration in promulgating rules and in interpreting provisions of the regulations issued pursuant to the act. As I told this House on May 11, during consideration of the appropriation for the Veterans' Administration, I intend to do everything in my power to see that the sick and disabled veterans are treated with justice and fairness. I was one of the first Members of this House to sign the petition calling for a Democratic caucus on this important subject, and you may be sure that I intend to continue my efforts to see that the injustices in the administration of the Economy Act are abolished.

Mr. Speaker, my particular interest is in the reductions applied to certain classes of service-connected cases of disability. I submit that it was not the intention of the Congress, nor do I believe it was the intention of President Roosevelt, to slash the allowances to these veterans by 50, 60, and 70 percent. Yet I have the evidence in my office, in the form of statements from veterans in my own district, that this very thing is being done. It appears that those charged with carrying out the act have disregarded the spirit of the law as passed by the Congress, and have not only reduced the allowance for particular disability ratings but have also revised the schedule of ratings for certain disabilities and injuries so that the veteran is subjected to an unreasonable reduction.

There are a number of other important phases of this matter that demand attention immediately. If action is not taken without delay by the Veterans' Administration officials and the Executive, I predict that it will be taken by the Congress, and I for one intend to do all in my power to right these wrongs.

All classes of our citizenship have been called upon to make sacrifices in the economic crisis that recently confronted the Nation. No greater patriotism was shown by any of them, however, than by the veterans. Those in my district—and I know this is true of the Nation at large—have cheerfully accepted the added burden they have been called upon to bear. They should not, however, be subjected to unfair treatment and great suffering.

Our President has shown himself to be a man of great sympathies and a strong sense of justice and fair play. He is doing an almost superhuman task and I know that he is not able to examine minutely all details of the vast emergency program he has inaugurated. However, I feel sure that when the serious wrongs that have been committed in the name of economy are called to his attention, he will take prompt steps to rectify them.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 159

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Printing, I call up from the Speaker's desk House Resolution 159.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 159

Resolved, That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Labor of the House be, and it is hereby, empowered to have printed for its use 1,000 copies of the hearings held before said committee relative to 30-hour work week, Seventy-second Congress, second session.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 4, page 1, strike out "1,000" and insert "500."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

HOOR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet tomorrow at 11 o'clock a.m.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GOVERNORSHIP OF HAWAII

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker and colleagues, there was read in this Chamber Monday a message from the President asking that the residence qualifications for the Governor of Hawaii, as set forth in the organic act of Hawaii, be temporarily set aside to enable the President to select for that post, if he so chooses, a nonresident of Hawaii.

Ladies and gentlemen, to say that this action came as a surprise to me is putting my emotions mildly. I was stunned. Nor do I yet comprehend the reason for such a request from the administration, for it is well known that Hawaii has among her own citizens many men well qualified for the governorship of the Territory. And the message indicates an intention, or at least a desire, to name someone not a resident, someone from the mainland United States; in short, to appoint what is known in the South as a carpet-bagger.

Mr. Speaker and Members of this House, as Delegate in Congress from Hawaii, as a resident of Hawaii for the past 51 years, and as a Democrat, I must oppose any action by Congress that will in any way curtail the measure of self-government and of home rule which the Territory of Hawaii has enjoyed since it became by joint resolution of Congress part and parcel of the United States.

Since 1840 the people of Hawaii have governed themselves under a form of constitutional government patterned closely after that of the United States, to whom Hawaii has always looked for example and to whom she voluntarily annexed herself in the closing years of the last century.

From 1840 to 1893, under the monarchy, Hawaii had a constitution, was recognized by the United States as an independent member of the family of nations, and showed herself capable of producing leaders qualified to direct the affairs of her people. Under the provisional government from 1893 to 1894 the constitutional form of government was retained, and was continued under the Republic, which endured for the following 4 years. The Republic of Hawaii in 1898 voluntarily became annexed to the United States, and since that date the Constitution of the United States and its allied body of laws has applied.

Thus for 93 years Hawaii has proven herself capable of handling her own affairs, of making her local laws, electing her legislators, and of producing her leaders, be they kings, presidents, or governors, from among her own people.

I call your attention to the report of the Committee on Territories of the Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, which accompanied H.R. 10990. This bill set up a new government for Hawaii, and in its report the commission appointed to make recommendations incorporated in a majority of instances the laws and practices then in vogue in Hawaii into the new form of government which was established in 1900, when Hawaii became a Territory of the United States.

Ladies and gentlemen, I would call your attention to this fact in particular: Whereas the organic act, as first passed by this body, and which was in force for 21 years, specified that the Governor of Hawaii must be a citizen of the Territory, which meant a residence there of but 1 year, on July 9, 1921, the Congress of the United States amended this organic act to increase that residence requirement to 3 years, and specified that this term of residence must be next preceding appointment.

Was not this action an indication that Congress believed 3 years' residence in Hawaii a necessary qualification for the Governor? Does not that indicate that this body once decided that in order to know conditions in Hawaii, to understand her people, and to be able to perform the duties of governor with fairness and justice to the people of Hawaii the Governor should have lived among those people for at least 3 years next preceding his appointment to office?

If on two previous occasions Congress decided that the Governor of Hawaii had best be drawn from her own citizens, would you now rescind that action, remove the safeguard which assures the people of this Commonwealth that their chief executive be one of their own citizens, a friend who knows and understands them, and whom, because of this knowledge and understanding, they can trust as their leader?

The new Governor of Alaska, whom the President but recently appointed, and who was confirmed by the Senate, was a resident of the Territory of Alaska at the time of his appointment. Why, then, should an exception be made in the case of Hawaii?

Why even a temporary repeal of the residence qualifications for the Governor of Hawaii? There is no national emergency in which Hawaii is involved, and in which a mainland appointee for Governor would better serve the interests of the Nation than a resident of Hawaii. To be sure, Hawaii is suffering from the depression, but so are the 48 States, and yet there is no threat to name a carpet-bagger as governor of any of the States. If the economic situation in Hawaii is acute, is it not logical to assume that one familiar with conditions in the Territory, with its people, its history, and its problems, can better serve as chief executive?

Our racial situation in Hawaii may be unique, but this very fact indicates the need of one familiar with the mental reactions, habits, and conduct of its racial groups in order to best inspire in them the trust and confidence which the Governor must have to properly fulfill his duties and obligations.

There is nothing in the racial problems of Hawaii that is a menace to harmony and the proper development of the Territory if allowed to develop naturally. This is indicated in a report submitted after a personal investigation by Mr. William Atherton Du Puy, former executive assistant to the Secretary of the Interior under the previous administration.

Hawaii has developed business, commercial, and industrial enterprises that compare favorably with those in any part of the United States. To do this she has had citizen leadership able to cope with unique and unusual situations, from which the Territory has always emerged victorious. We have our full quota of business executives and men of public affairs who are keenly alive to the problems of the Territory and who are willing and capable of maintaining this leadership.

I am frank to confess that I do not see how the principles of Jeffersonian Democracy, of State rights and home rule, and the horror of carpetbaggers, all of which is part and parcel of the Democratic political faith, can permit of any action which would deprive Hawaii or any other Commonwealth of the United States of the fullest measure of local self-government and home rule which our present laws guarantee.

Certainly the passage of any legislation which would permit the appointment of a nonresident, a carpetbagger, as Governor of Hawaii, would not be keeping faith with the people of Hawaii or of the continental United States who are now looking to the Democratic Party as the guardian of their rights.

In short, Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen, I oppose any move to allow the appointment of a nonresident as Governor of Hawaii on the grounds that for nearly a century the people of Hawaii have maintained a just and fair government; that they have shown themselves capable of meeting their own problems and solving them satisfactorily; that they have had in the past, and have now, many men capable of the leadership which the Governor should assume; that no nonresident is qualified for this leadership; that no emergency now exists which makes necessary the change of existing laws to permit the appointment of a nonresident; and that, on the contrary, the unemployment and other economic conditions existing as a result of the depression make it peculiarly necessary that the Governor of Hawaii be a citizen of that Territory.

I am forced to believe that the President has been misinformed regarding conditions in Hawaii, for on no other assumption can I understand his request. Certain it is that the people of Hawaii do not favor such a move, for on Monday there was read into the record of the Senate, and appears on page 3875 of the RECORD of May 22, a concurrent resolution passed by the Territorial legislature vigorously opposing any change in the residence qualifications of Hawaii's Governor.

I am a Democrat, have always been a Democrat, and shall continue to be a Democrat. But while I have heartily approved most of the legislation so far sponsored by the present administration, I have no course but to oppose this effort to make possible the appointment of a carpetbagger as Governor of Hawaii. My duty to Hawaii and my own personal convictions, the result of half a century of residence in Hawaii, dictate this opposition.

I therefore submit to this honorable body that a change in the organic act of Hawaii to permit the appointment of a nonresident as Governor is not an emergency measure. It is rather an undemocratic deal, an unfair deal, an unjust deal for the people of Hawaii.

CHILD-LABOR AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION

RETURN OF COURT RECORDS USED IN IMPEACHMENT TRIAL

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair asks that the following order be entered returning papers used in the trial for the purpose of withdrawing them from the files of the Senate. The clerk will report the order.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to return to the clerk of the United States District Court for the Northern District of California the original papers filed in said court which were offered in evidence during the proceedings of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Harold Louderback, judge of the court aforesaid.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, just a moment. I did not hear the reading, and before the order is entered I should like to inquire what it is and who offers it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed by the Parliamentarian that the district court in California desires the return of the original papers, and, therefore, the order has been prepared.

Mr. NORRIS. I am only anxious to ascertain what is being returned. Does it include everything that was offered in evidence during the impeachment trial?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It includes everything that was filed in evidence from the records of the district court in California. The order authorizes the return of those records to the files of that court.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that, but there was other evidence that never was offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has all been printed in the record the Chair is informed.

Mr. NORRIS. Certain returns made by Judge Louderback to the assessment never were filed. Are they in the clerk's possession?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are not included in this order, the Chair is informed by the Parliamentarian.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order will be entered.

The Chief Clerk read the petition and signatures, as follows:

PETITION OF THE UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF MAYORS

To the PRESIDING OFFICER OF THE SENATE.

To the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE.

To the CHAIRMAN OF THE HOUSE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE.

To the CHAIRMAN OF THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE.

We, the undersigned, being mayors of 50 of the largest cities of the United States and representing as we do the consensus of opinion of the 93 cities with a population of 100,000 and over, and representing 45 percent of the population of the United States, in conference assembled at the Mayflower Hotel in Washington, D.C., on this 24th day of May 1933, respectfully call your attention to the following preamble and resolution unanimously adopted:

"We call to your attention a grave crisis that threatens the very foundation of all credit in the United States. Municipal credit due to inability of citizens to pay taxes, and because no market exists for tax certificates permits of no further borrowing. The banks, in fact, loan us less money to meet our needs than they did before the war. So far, over 1,000 local units have defaulted on their bonds. If municipal credit is allowed to collapse, we warn you that all faith and credit in banks and industry will be undermined and collapse with it.

"Practically every city has cut its budget to the bone. We have learned that overreduction of budgets simply increases expenditures for poor relief out of all proportions. We have in many cities already cut our police and fire service and crippled our schools. Within a relatively short time a large additional number of cities will be forced to default on their bonds for the first time in history.

"Municipal bonds are held by banks, insurance companies, and trust funds, not to speak of savings accounts of widows and orphans.

"In most instances local banks have completely failed in advancing even the minimum of loans necessary.

"The Federal Reserve banks claim their funds must be liquid so as to serve member banks, and are powerless in any event to meet more than a fraction of our needs.

"The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is designed to loan money to private corporations except only for partially or wholly self-liquidating projects that are so few as to be inconsequential.

"We assert that if Congress will do for municipal corporations what you have done and are now doing for private corporations we will need to ask no other consideration. The advancement of not to exceed $1,000,000,000 a year for not to exceed 2 years will meet all our needs.

"Our private banking institutions using persuasive methods come to Washington and secure financial aid—not to the extent of millions but to the tune of billions of dollars of our taxpayers' money. Railroads, insurance companies, and other fiduciary institutions are saved by you because it is deemed wise public policy to do so.

"If the Congress of the United States does not at this moment protect our cities and the 65,000,000 people who live under our care and whom we must serve, then the sole responsibility for a collapse of democratic municipal government will lie on the doorsteps of your body—the people's body to whom we look for assistance.

"We did not cause the economic depression. We are not responsible for the utter inability of thousands of our citizens to pay their taxes. We are not responsible for the 15,000,000 willing people who would work could they but find it. We are not responsible for the closing of the door of legitimate credit in our faces.

"This situation is nothing more than a national calamity requiring national action. Just 1 year ago many of you believed we were extravagant in our statements when we said people were destitute; today all of the $300,000,000 you provided in response to our demands is gone. Then we were right. We knew because we had to look into the faces of needy people out of work and in dire circumstances.

"Now for a few millions of dollars our cities can be saved, our employees can be paid, our health, welfare, educational, fire, and police services can be continued, our credit can be maintained, and we can be tided over the most serious emergency that has ever confronted the American cities.

"If this is not done, we warn you that the collapse of municipal credit will ultimately affect the entire credit structure of the country, including the credit of the United States Government.

"We therefore inform you, since you alone can afford a remedy to prevent the rapidly approaching collapse of city government, that we shall not be charged with neglect in failing to apprise you of the facts or that you shall fail to share your just portion of responsibility.

"We therefore recommend that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act be amended at this session to authorize the purchase of or loans upon tax anticipation or tax delinquency certificates or notes of municipalities and public bodies issuing the same in the ratio of 75 percent of the 1933 or current taxes and 50 percent of past due outstanding taxes or delinquencies and on such plans as State-debt limitations will not be exceeded. These securities have back of them the full faith and credit of our cities.

"If your reason for refusing us this remedy be, as alleged by some, that the credit of the Federal Government will be impaired, then we insist that you amend the National Industrial Recovery Act which you are soon to consider or any other pending measure, so that the Comptroller of the Currency be directed to accept our legal municipal bonds and our tax certificates as a basis of an issue of an equal amount of bank notes and their delivery to us. This is a privilege you now extend to national and Federal Reserve banks. What excuse may be offered for not extending this privilege to cities?

"We hereby also inform you that the present public-works bill now before Congress will not serve its purpose if you do not take the above action. Practically no city is in a position to issue bonds for these proposed construction projects when it is absolutely impossible to secure funds to finance current operations. If this Congress is looking to the cities to embark upon large works programs with the incentive of a 30-percent direct grant, then your body will be disappointed. Many are already bonded up to their constitutional debt limits now, and you expect us to issue additional bonds and thus plunge us into further financial difficulties.

"Our only opportunity for fulfilling our share in a great national movement to put people back to work, with which we are in hearty accord, is dependent upon adoption of the above proposals; and, second, to completely liberalize this bill now before you. Not only must the Federal Government increase the present 30-percent provision but repayments, payments of principal and interest on bonds issued by us should not begin until January 1, 1936. The act should specifically provide for the purchase of the bonds against the balance of the cost of municipal projects.

"Any failure on your part to act at this session will mean in our solemn opinion chaos in most cities.

"With this attending collapse of credit there comes all the attending evils of governmental breakdown. The failure of municipalities to provide proper police protection and adequate fire defense means disaster to every American home. The additional failure to safeguard our health and sanitation means to revert to the deprivations and hardships of our grandfathers.

"The sole question is, Will you assist our people in their hour of greatest need?"

Respectfully submitted by executive committee of United States Conference of Mayors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the petition just read calls attention to a very serious condition in our country. It was serious when we first considered the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. At that time I offered an amendment permitting loans to cities. This received a considerable number of votes in the Senate, but not enough to bring about its adoption.

I assure you, Mr. President, that conditions in municipalities and in counties are serious indeed. I was home last week, and while there drove over to the county seat of Rockland County, which is a small but well-to-do county.

I talked with the county treasurer. The authorities have just finished their tax collections. I was shocked to learn that 40 percent of the taxes assessed against property in that county are unpaid—40 percent—almost one half of the taxes unpaid!

A similar condition exists in the cities. In consequence the municipal operations, the ordinary functions of city and county government, are breaking down. As the petition points out, those things which we have come to regard as fundamental, such as fire protection, police protection, health protection, are being hampered. In consequence of the necessities of the various divisions of government it has been necessary to do away with many of the activities which we have come to regard as essential.

I am not sure just how far we can go in the Congress in the relief of the situation. But if we are actually conscientious and honest in our statement that we believe there is an economic upturn in the country—and I believe that is true—we ought to extend such aid as we can to the cities and counties during the period of reconstruction. I hope, Mr. President, we may find it possible to grant the request of these mayors and to do what they have proposed.

I have had the feeling, and expressed it 2 years ago when we had the bill up originally, and I repeat it now, that there has not been that hearty cooperation on the part of the banks with the authorities in the various communities that there should have been.

We have gone far out of our way to provide resources for our banks. We have placed at their disposal tremendous sums of money. But I have the feeling that in many instances they have failed to do their part; for example, in the relief of municipal distress and the official distress of those in charge of the various divisions of government. I think we may well afford to give serious thought to the petition which has been presented.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the railroads, the banks, the insurance companies, the mortgage companies, and others that we selected for the purpose of borrowing from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had been able to get the money from the banks, of course, there would have been no necessity for establishing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It was done because those institutions petitioned us and told us they could not get the money from the banks.

Now, it is true that the cities cannot get money from the banks. If we pity the railroads, and the banks, and the insurance companies, why should we be denying the same treatment to the cities and counties, and to other people, for that matter? It will be remembered that when the present Vice President was a Member of the House and Speaker of that body he was the author of a bill that allowed loans to be made generally—in other words, to furnish the people with credit facilities. He was very greatly taken to task. I am of the opinion that if we loan to one class of our citizens, the Government ought, in fairness, to lend to all classes of our citizens.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator is right. Yet I am in full accord with what we have done in the way of helping the banks and the railroads and the insurance companies. We had to do that. I have no criticism to offer of the relief we have extended in those directions. But I repeat that in my opinion the local banks have not been—I do not like to use the word “generous”, but they have not been fair with the municipalities. They have imposed burdens upon municipalities in the way of high rates of interest and conditions imposed that have been almost impossible for the officials to carry out. But we cannot permit these local divisions of government to break down.

To my mind one of the most distressing things of the economic situation is what has happened to the schools of America. We have boasted in America that the pupil of the school is the cornerstone of our national idealism and of our national life, and yet we find schools everywhere under the necessity of shortening their terms. I think I read that Chicago has recently determined that it will shorten the term of school this year 2 or 3 weeks in order that that money may be saved. We cannot permit this to go on. I remember that the ordinance of 1787 stated that “religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.” I think I have correctly quoted that immortal document.

Yet we find in various municipalities and other political units schools are being closed because of the inability of those communities to cash in on the taxes assessed. I am not sure how far we can go to relieve the situation, but I am confident we should go as far as we possibly can. We must do this in order that municipal and county governments shall not break down and that the schools may be maintained. Because of this feeling I have listened with the greatest interest to the reading of the petition.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to supplement what the Senator from New York has said in connection with the petition of the mayors of the cities of this country, and to say that I express the hope that the Finance Committee may give prompt attention to this very serious problem. The Senator from New York has not exaggerated the situation in the least.

The mayor of the city of Boston has been one of the leaders in this movement for organizing the mayors to bring this important problem to the attention of the Federal Government; and I know that the mayors of all the cities of Massachusetts are very much interested in having something done to prevent the economic collapse with which many of our cities are faced by reason of their inability to collect taxes upon real estate and meet the tremendous increase in their welfare appropriations. A conference between the governors of the several States and the President would be helpful in suggesting what the Federal Government should and can do in cooperation with the States to help the credit of our cities.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution relating to the payment of the soldiers' bonus in cash

Whereas under the economy bill passed by Congress the payments to veterans have been reduced by not less than $432,000,000, in addition to which the Federal Government is now contemplating a reduction of $35,000,000 in the appropriation for veterans' administration; and

Whereas this last action, according to National Commander Louis A. Johnson, of the American Legion, will add to the many thousands of disabled veterans who have been cut off from all disability aid, 6,000 more veterans who are employed in the field offices of the Veterans' Administration, plus many more disabled veterans who have been getting lodging and a small wage for light work at hospitals and veterans' homes; and

Whereas in the Soldiers' Bonus Act of 1924, the United States Government promised the men who served this country during the World War at a wage of $1 per day, that the pecuniary losses which they sustained through this service would be partially compensated, but this debt, due and owing now for 9 years, still remains unpaid; and

Whereas under the leadership of President Roosevelt the country is now embarking on a policy of stimulating business recovery through the expansion of the currency; and

Whereas immediate payment of the soldiers' bonus in cash would not only save many veterans whose disability allowances have been taken from them from becoming public charges, but would fall in line with the President's policy of expanding the currency and would stimulate the revival of business activity: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact legislation for the immediate payment in cash of the soldiers' bonus promised to veterans in 1924, such payment to be made in new currency, which through this method will come into general circulation; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter from Hugh Lee Kirby, of New York City, N.Y., transmitting a draft of proposed legislation designed to relieve the depression, creating a new financial structure for the United States, guaranteeing all money issued, whether it be gold, silver, or paper, etc., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate telegrams in the nature of memorials from the Allendale Veneer Co., by C. P. Moore, and from sundry other citizens, all of Allendale, S.C., remonstrating against the imposition of an additional Federal tax on gasoline, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Lions Club of Galveston and members of the East Texas Division, Texas Good Roads Association, all in the State of Texas, endorsing the program of President Roosevelt and favoring inauguration of a public-works program providing unemployment relief through the construction of roads in the State of Texas, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the executive committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, favoring the imposition of special taxes to take care of interest and sinking-fund expenditures under the proposed industrial control bill, and opposing the application of normal income-tax rates to incomes from corporation dividends for such purpose, and recommending that the additional revenue necessary to meet the expenditures be raised by means of a sales tax, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Laundryowners National Association of the United States and Canada, at Joliet, Ill., favoring the passage of legislation to inaugurate a program of intra-industry cooperation through established national trade associations, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a memorial from R. E. Poole, of Alexandria, La., endorsing Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, and remonstrating against a senatorial investigation of his alleged acts and conduct, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KEAN presented a telegram from F. S. Albright, city clerk of Camden, N.J., embodying a resolution adopted by the Board of Commissioners of the City of Camden, N.J., favoring amendment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act so that that Corporation may be authorized to loan municipalities 75 percent upon estimated tax income for the year 1933, and 50 percent on 1932 tax delinquencies upon tax-anticipation bonds, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from J. H. Bachelier, president of the Fidelity Union Trust Co., of Newark; Kelley Graham, president the First National Bank of Jersey City; and William J. Couse, president Asbury Park National Bank & Trust Co., all in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the passage of legislation providing guarantee of bank deposits, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. TYDINGS presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Maryland, memorializing Congress to enact House Joint Resolution 191, commemorating the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the naturalization as an American citizen in 1783 of Brig. Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko, a hero of the Revolutionary War, by issuing special series of postage stamps in his honor, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

(See joint resolution printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on the 20th instant, p. 3797, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by Gun Hill Post, No. 271, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, of the Bronx, New York City, N.Y., favoring reconsideration of the Executive orders and regulations relative to hospital and domiciliary care of veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask that there may be inserted in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce in opposition to the ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty. I do this because this body has taken pains to investigate very thoroughly all the arguments used in favor of the treaty. Likewise it has outlined its own opposition founded upon studies made by the chamber in opposition to the treaty.

I ask that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CLEVELAND CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
May 20, 1933.

HON. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: As a matter of information I enclose herewith a copy of a resolution urging opposition to ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty, adopted by the board of directors of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce May 17.

Yours very truly,

FRANK H. BAER,
Transportation Commissioner.

Whereas there is now pending in the Senate of the United States a treaty providing for the construction and operation by the United States and Canada of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway; and

Whereas the board of directors of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, desiring its study of this subject to be made from the broadest possible standpoint, assigned that study to several of its most important committees—the manufacturers committee, the river and harbor committee, the transportation committee, the foreign trade committee, and the committee on American merchant marine; and

Whereas these committees, viewing the subject not merely from the point of view of Cleveland but more broadly from the point of view of the industrial region of the Great Lakes, and from the point of view of its great shipping and transportation interests, have made careful reports on this subject to the board of directors; and

Whereas the great majority of the membership of these committees signed reports to the directors adverse to the ratification of the treaty, and a small minority only signed reports favorable to the ratification of the treaty:

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce finds the arguments in favor of ratification to be stated as follows:

(1) It is urged that, though present conditions clearly do not show a sufficient volume of probable traffic to and from Cleveland to justify heavy expenditures on a deep waterway, our future foreign trade may justify its construction.

(2) Savings in freight charges, particularly on exported wheat, will be of substantial advantage to agriculture and some industries.

(3) It is suggested that opposition to ratification might adversely affect Cleveland's position with the Federal Government in connection with harbor-improvement appropriations.

(4) Failure on the part of the Senate of the United States to ratify a treaty now signed may possibly have an adverse effect on some of our foreign relations.

(5) Continued enforcement of Federal provisions against Chicago's diversion of water from the Great Lakes would be more adequately safeguarded; and

Resolved, That the board of directors finds the arguments opposed to ratification to be stated as follows:

(1) The cost of the project to the United States, arising from the navigation features alone, on a conservative estimate, will be not less than $300,000,000. As it is contemplated that the use of the waterway shall be free, it cannot be self-sustaining, and its capital and operating costs must be paid out of the Public Treasury. Not only is it obvious that no such expenditure should be undertaken under present conditions but no national program of economy can be made successful if future commitments of this sort are to be made. The expense involved would constitute a subsidy to whatever interests can make use of the waterway, with the expense being met by the general public.

It is pointed out that the expense to the United States not only will constitute a subsidy to certain interests but that those interests will be largely foreign. At least 60 percent of the grain making use of the waterway would be of Canadian origin and it appears certain that this percentage will increase. To the extent that ship operators may be benefited, the subsidy will go to foreign ships for reasons shown below. The foreign consumer of exported products, particularly grain, will receive some if not most of the possible transportation savings, and producers in foreign countries will be able to use transportation savings to increase their sales in the United States.

(2) The water-power features of the project, the cost of which is not included in the estimate made above, will be of limited benefit, for modern steam-power plants have so reduced costs that it is impossible that water power can be distributed from St. Lawrence River plants to areas of greatest power consumption. The production of water power on the proposed waterway will not be self-sustaining for years, probably until unforeseen industrial development near the proposed plants takes place. Such development would be, to some extent at least, competitive with Cleveland and every other industrial center. Its furtherance through governmental expenditures would be a most unjustifiable subsidy.

(3) A study of present traffic and future possibilities is conclusive that there is no vital need of the deep waterway and that its construction would not be followed by the entrance of fleets of great ocean liners into harbors of the Great Lakes. In fact, only a revolutionary change in manufacture and the processes of distribution could result in the establishment of any substantial and regular shipping schedules between the Great Lakes and foreign ports. Such support as the project has received in Cleveland is based almost entirely on future hopes and not at all on any definite showing of present or future needs.

(4) Savings in transportation charges urged by supporters of the waterway have been exaggerated in amount and misconceived in effect. It has been urged that the farmers will benefit to the extent of from 6 to 10 cents per bushel by reason of increased prices resulting from reduced transportation costs to world markets. In the first place, the amount of possible saving must come out of costs by existing agencies, and during the past season the cost of moving grain from the head of the Lakes to the seaboard has been less than 6 cents, so that, unless ocean ships are to be expected to make the inland journey for less than nothing, there could have been no saving of 6 cents, to say nothing of 10. Even under higher lake and canal charges it is impossible to arrive at sound figures which would indicate a saving of as much as 6 cents. Even when the amount of the saving is ascertained, the problem remains as to whether it would be reflected in prices on the farm or be absorbed by foreign consumers and ships. In a buyer's market such as that of the past few years it is entirely probable that the saving would be reflected in lower world prices and not in increases for the American farmer.

Savings to Cleveland shippers have been generally over-estimated, and, whatever they may be, they are subject to reduction by reason of losses through slower movement, lesser frequency of service, higher insurance rates, etc., than prevail in connection with present available routes. At any rate, no allegation of saving in transportation costs appears in support of the waterway in the committee reports.

(5) Construction of the waterway will increase foreign competition in certain important respects. Competition from foreign countries having low wage scales is already being met in our seaport cities in such commodities as iron ore, pig iron, wire and wire goods, copper, coal, lumber, pigments, and petroleum products. Cleveland is interested in all of these and the same competitive developments would follow the free movement of foreign-registry vessels through a deep waterway such as that proposed.

The case of coal is cited particularly, for the reason that it can be definitely shown, and its effects are so broad. About 6,000,000 tons of bituminous coal are annually moved via Lake Erie ports to Canada, a highly desirable business for the suffering coal industry of this general area, worth-while traffic for our railroads, and excellent return tonnage for the lake fleet. The construction of the waterway would permit the through movement of Welsh and Nova Scotian coals to the joint injury of the mines, railroads, and lake carriers of the United States.

Similar adverse influences upon the interests of this country can be shown as probable in connection with other commodities.

(6) Present modes of service will be injured by the construction of the new route just to the extent that it may prove useful. If it moves little or no traffic it will not seriously injure the railroads nor the Lake carriers, but it should not be built unless it does carry a large tonnage. If it does divert a large amount of business, the railroads and the present Lake fleet will be the losers. The Federal Government has attempted to prevent financial collapse of the railroads by extending its credit to them. To spend additional sums on a competing agency which will tend to make the security for railroad loans less valuable would be a paradoxical move. Moreover those communities which do not have access to the waterway would find their rail service weakened as the result of Government expenditures made to benefit other localities.

(7) It is apparently quite certain that serious injury would result to the lake carriers. They are today operating under the best labor conditions and the highest wage scale for maritime service in the world. Their costs are such that they cannot possibly compete with foreign registry vessels which could undertake service into and from the lakes. A part of their present traffic in grain would be diverted to through ocean vessels, not under the flag of the United States, and part of the coal tonnage now used to balance the downward movement of ore and grain would be taken away by the direct entry of Welsh and Nova Scotian coal into the western Canadian market.

(8) No consideration has yet been given to the cost of harbor and shore terminal construction which would be necessary before the proposed waterway would be of any particular benefit to the city of Cleveland. Whatever the public cost would be, it would certainly be more than either the city, county, State, or National Government could afford; and no private sources have been discovered from which the funds could be raised.

(9) The lack of present demand for through movement, mentioned above, is evidenced by the complete failure of three attempts to establish such service through existing facilities. One of these three attempts was supported by the fact that inbound cargoes of foreign rails actually did move to a port on Lake Erie, and only return tonnage was needed to assure success.

Therefore be it

Resolved by the board of directors of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, That its action be recorded in opposition to the ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty by the Senate of the United States.

Adopted May 17, 1933, Cleveland, Ohio.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

RECOGNITION OF SENATORS

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana and Mr. GLASS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I should like to direct an inquiry to the Chair. Is it the policy of the Chair to substitute the House rules for the Senate rules? I was on my feet and looked directly at the Chair and the Chair looked directly at me minutes before anybody else asked for recognition. I have been trying to secure recognition ever since and the Chair deliberately ignores me. Now, is it the policy of the Chair to do that? That is what I want to know.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the policy of the Chair to recognize the Senator who is in charge of the legislation pending before the Senate. The banking bill is the unfinished business; the Senator from Virginia asked recognition and the Chair recognized him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is contrary to the rule of the Senate and I insist that the rules of the Senate be adhered to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can appeal from the ruling of the Chair in recognizing the Senator from Virginia if he so desires.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I shall not appeal from the ruling of the Chair, but the rules are there and the Chair should enforce the rules, and I hope the Senate will be fair enough to see that they are enforced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to be perfectly fair with every Member of the Senate, but it does seem to the Chair that it is his duty to recognize the Senator in charge of legislation that is pending before the Senate as the unfinished business. Therefore, the Chair recognized the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Just a final suggestion. It is the duty of the Chair, as I understand the Chair's duty, to abide by the rules and adhere to the rules of the Senate and not those of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not trying to enforce the rules of the House. However, he has the right of recognition, and he is going to exercise that right so long as he occupies this position.

REGULATION OF BANKING

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1631) to provide for the safe of more effective use of the assets of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations, to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I deem it unnecessary to go into any further explanation of the unfinished business, S. 1631, because on last week I made a rather exhaustive exposition of the bill. I find that there are 3 or 4 amendments proposed to the bill, the most important of which is the amendment submitted by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to section 12 (c), on page 45, after line 3. I should like to say to the Senator from Michigan that upon consultation with the subcommittee in charge of the bill now before the Senate, the subcommittee decided to accept the amendment and let it go to conference.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

INVESTIGATION OF BANKING OPERATIONS

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt the Senator from Virginia in the consideration of the unfinished business, but it is exceedingly important that I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution reported yesterday, being Senate Resolution 70. There is no objection to it. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] states that it is satisfactory to him to have immediate consideration, and I would appreciate it if the Senator from Virginia would yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. GLASS. If it will not displace the banking bill or take me from the floor, I shall have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If no one should make the point of order, the Senator would not lose the floor. Unless he asks unanimous consent for that purpose, he will lose the floor if anyone makes the point of order.

Mr. GLASS. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent to yield to the Senator from South Carolina to consider a resolution without the Senator from Virginia losing the floor. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, is that the resolution to which I objected last evening?

Mr. BYRNES. It is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, with an amendment, in line 10, to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$20,000", so as to read:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 56, agreed to April 4, 1933, authorizing and directing the Committee on Banking and Currency to make investigations of the business of banking, financing, and extending credit and other practices therein mentioned in addition to the authority contained in — Resolution 84, agreed to March 4, 1932, hereby is continued in full force and effect until the beginning of the second session of the Seventy-third Congress, and the amount authorized to be expended from the contingent fund of the Senate for above-mentioned purposes hereby is increased $20,000 in addition to the amounts previously authorized to be expended in pursuance of the purposes of such resolutions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

REGULATION OF BANKING

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1631) to provide for the safe and more effective use of the assets of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations, to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator from Michigan desired in some respect to perfect his proposed amendment to the bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The only possible change that would be made in the text is incidental and was suggested by the able junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY]. He indicated to me this noon that he thought it would be perfectly proper for the amendment in its printed form to go to conference, and the incidental correction, if necessary, can be made in conference.

Mr. GLASS. I think that would expedite the matter.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I thank the Senator for his expression on behalf of himself and his colleagues on the subcommittees, and say to him that inasmuch as the amendment is now pending and inasmuch as it appears to be satisfactory to the subcommittee, I am perfectly willing that it may be voted upon immediately without any further observations on my part or any debate.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. LONG. Can no one else get the floor this morning at all?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. I want to be recognized before the vote is taken. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] cannot get recognition, but I want to be recognized before we vote. I want to say something.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? What is the procedure now? Is there to be rank favoritism in the recognition of one Senator or another? I have the floor now apparently by grace of the yielding of the Senator from Louisiana, but I cannot get it on direct appeal to the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Virginia yields the floor, the Chair will recognize some other Senator who asks recognition. Until the Senator from Virginia yields the floor, the Chair cannot recognize any other Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. The Chair stated the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan. Is not that debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. NORRIS. Has not any Senator the right to debate it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has.

Mr. NORRIS. Can he debate it as long as the Senator from Virginia holds the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He cannot.

Mr. NORRIS. Does it not follow naturally that any Senator is entitled to debate the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Any Senator who can obtain the floor. When the Senator from Virginia yields the floor the Chair will recognize any other Senator asking for recognition.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I have no disposition on earth to deprive any Senator of the floor, neither the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] nor the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. That has not been my purpose. My only purpose has been to proceed as expeditiously as the Senate may permit with the consideration of the unfinished business. I had hoped that it would not involve a great deal of discussion and that therefore the Senator from Indiana might obtain the floor a little later and proceed to the discussion of any matter he desired to discuss. May I ask if the Senator from Indiana wants to discuss any provision of the pending bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not intend to discuss the pending measure at all. I have an entirely different matter I desire to present to the Senate, and, of course, I suspect the Chair knew that. Whether I desire to talk about the bill or some other matter, I should be recognized as soon as I rise on the floor and ask for recognition if the Chair sees me first. That is the rule of the Senate. That is not the House rule, but it is the rule here. We have never had a czar here with the power of an autocrat. I do not think the Senate desires one. Things have been going along that way lately, and it has become more and more difficult for one to be recognized, especially a Member on this side of the Chamber. That is why I objected. I propose to discuss an entirely different matter, unrelated to the measure in charge of the Senator from Virginia, as I have a perfect right to do.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Indiana that his quarrel seems to be with the Chair. He certainly did not indicate to me that he desired to proceed with any other discussion. I have no disposition to exclude him from the floor or prevent his discussion of matters. I simply hoped to go along with the bill of which I am in charge.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I appreciate the Senator's attitude. I never knew it was necessary for me to discuss the question of whether I wanted to speak or not with any other Senator on the floor or even with the Vice President. I always assumed that all a Senator needed to do, if he is properly commissioned here and has been seated, was to ask for recognition courteously and it would be accorded. It has always been done during the 8 years I have been here. Only in these latter days have I seen any departure at all from that rule.

Mr. GLASS. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator, provided it does not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I cannot displace the unfinished business. I merely want to make some observations about our mythical ambassador abroad who has never been confirmed by the United States Senate to my knowledge, and, therefore, has no particular authority to represent the Government. That is all.

Mr. President, who has the floor now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. GLASS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana if he wants to make a speech.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will very gladly assume that I can get recognition when the Senator from Virginia has concluded. I do not seek to displace the Senator. I just want to speak before there is a vote on the bill or any amendment, and I wanted to get the floor as early as I could. That is why I appealed to the Chair.

Mr. GLASS. I should think the Senator would speak right now because the question is a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator yields to me for that purpose?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Indiana permit the Chair to make a statement?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no knowledge whatever of the subject about which the Senator from Indiana desires to speak. The Chair repeats that when two Senators rise on the floor of the Senate and ask for recognition, one being in charge of the legislation pending before the Senate, it is his duty to recognize the Senator in charge of that legislation, under the rule of the Senate, both Senators having desired recognition by the Chair. The Chair desires to treat every Senator absolutely fair. He has no desire to be a czar or autocrat of the Senate.

The Senator from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, in fairness to the Chair I desire to state that I took the precaution to notify the Chair that I expected to proceed with the unfinished business immediately this morning and asked him to recognize me. I have been on my feet ever since the hour of 12 o'clock.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, may I say that from the hour of 12 o'clock I, too, was on my feet seeking recognition when the Chair recognized the Senator from Virginia. I certainly had no complaint against the action of the Chair.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I did not suggest that the Senator from South Carolina had any complaint against the Chair. I do not believe he has. If I were in his position I would not have, either. [Laughter.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In view of what seems to me to be an unfortunate controversy that has arisen, I ask unanimous consent to have paragraph 1 of rule XIX inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The paragraph is as follows:

RULE XIX

DEBATE

1. When a Senator desires to speak, he shall rise and address the Presiding Officer, and shall not proceed until he is recognized, and the Presiding Officer shall recognize the Senator who shall first address him. No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent, and to obtain such consent he shall first address the Presiding Officer; and no Senator shall speak more than twice upon any one question in debate on the same day without leave of the Senate, which shall be determined without debate.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, it would be impossible for me to favor the repeal or defend a willful violation of the Senate rule which requires the Presiding Officer to recognize the Senator who first addresses the Chair. But it is very respectfully submitted that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], the fairness of whose usual argumentation is exceeded only by the vigor of his debate, is not justified in charging the distinguished Vice President with impropriety in recognizing the Senator from Virginia instead of the Senator from Indiana. The Senator from Virginia arose and properly sought recognition before the result of the roll call had been announced. The Senator from Indiana, with similar promptitude and propriety, endeavored to obtain the floor. Manifestly two Senators could not be recognized at the same time. In the circumstances, the Presiding Officer was obliged to favor one of those seeking to be heard. He appropriately discharged his duty, and to criticize him for his failure to perform the impossible task of recognizing two Senators at the same time is neither equitable nor kind.

The Senator from Indiana charges, by implication, that the action of the Chair was the result of political favoritism. This implication is refuted by the fact that the number of Republican Senators who have been called by the Chair to preside over the Senate during the last 11 weeks exceeds the number of Democratic Senators who were invited by the Republican Vice President to preside during the preceding 2 years.

Those present will instantly recall that within the last 2 weeks the Vice President appointed Republican members to preside over the important impeachment proceeding against Judge Louderback for 3 entire days. Those Senators are Mr. HEBERT, of Rhode Island, Mr. HASTINGS, of Delaware, and Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana, who has so energetically complained of the decision of the Chair.

It is submitted that upon due reflection all of the Members of the Senate, including the Senator from Indiana, will be compelled to concede that a more courteous, just, and efficient Vice President than Mr. Garner has not presided over the Senate in the memory of living men.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have no comment to make on the statement of the Senator from West Virginia, except to say that I addressed myself to one particular situation and one particular question. That was the duty of recognizing the first Member of the Senate on his feet and addressing the Chair. That is the rule. I ask that the rule be enforced.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. On that point, I insist that the Senator from Virginia was first on his feet. I came into the Senate Chamber 10 minutes before the Senate convened, and I got on my feet immediately at the hour of 12 o'clock, and received recognition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, this is not the first time this question has arisen, as the Chair very well knows; and the Chair, of course, perfectly well knows that I have had something to say on this question privately in the past. This is the first time I have ever discussed it before the Senate; but all I ask is that the rule be enforced—nothing more than that; that is all—and that it be fairly interpreted and fairly adhered to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana may proceed.

PROPOSED CONSULTATIVE PACT

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, it is merely stating a fact to say that the American people have been shocked in the last 48 hours by the astounding news emanating from Geneva to the effect that Norman H. Davis has presumed to lay before the Disarmament Conference a plan that would unquestionably involve the United States in all the wars that are now brewing throughout the world and those that may come in the future.

It is, of course, to be assumed that Mr. Davis is speaking for President Roosevelt, and it would be interesting to know where either of these gentlemen get the idea that they can possibly be clothed with any such authority.

If we agree to enter into a consultative pact with the great powers of the earth, we unquestionably abandon our traditional policy of neutrality among warring nations. If we enter into a consultative pact, we must agree to sanctions; that means that we bind ourselves to ratify any sanctions that may come out of consultation, and sanctions inevitably mean war.

This is frankly admitted by both France and Britain.

We also undertake to assist in designating the "aggressor" power and to league with other nations against the so-called "aggressor."

When we take that step, we throw neutrality to the winds.

With control of so many great news sources, Britain and France could easily make it appear that any war in which they should engage would be a defensive war. Accordingly, the moment we take this step, Uncle Sam will be expected to throw men and treasure into the balance and back up with armed force the demands of those with whom we are to be leagued.

If our masters are bound to involve us in foreign entanglements, it would seem to be better to go in by the front door, rather than the rear, and enter into an open alliance, offensive and defensive, with those powers, for then at least the American people would not be kept in suspense. They would frankly know what to expect. The truth is that the American people would never give their consent to any foreign entangling alliance of any kind, actual or implied, because they know it would eventually lead to war.

If the statement of Mr. Davis is to be taken at its face value, we also ratify the infamous Versailles Treaty, which we definitely refused to do when the matter was before the Senate. Instead, we negotiated a separate peace with the Central Powers.

Does anyone for a moment think that the Versailles Treaty will stand? Of course it cannot.

To both England and France the world conflict was a war of conquest. Germany was divested of Alsace-Lorraine and her colonial empire. Furthermore, her European territories were dismembered, as were those of Austria and Hungary. Boundaries are in a hodge-podge. If we were to follow the lead of Mr. Roosevelt and his agent in this matter, we should be forced to guarantee the status quo, unfair, inequitable, and impossible as it is. That could only mean that we should become involved immediately in all the wars of the earth. To this, the American people will never consent.

France and Britain have so thoroughly mismanaged matters that they have ruined Europe, and the results of the World War have almost ruined America.

President Roosevelt has no authority to negotiate any such consultative, war-producing agreement. For attempting it, Woodrow Wilson was thoroughly rebuked by his own people, and the present Chief Executive should profit by his example. There is enough trouble in this country to engage all of his attention. With more than 13,000,000 out of employment, it is the hope and prayer of the Republic that he will give his best thought and best efforts to remedying conditions here. We have enough to do to attend to our own business. Let Europe and the rest of the world look after their own affairs.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Just a second, and I will have completed this statement. Then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

It is utterly amazing that any one man would presume to arrogate to himself such vast power, such great authority, and such overwhelming responsibility.

Where does Mr. Roosevelt expect to get the men and money to back up this proposed agreement? Where will he get the soldiers, the cannon fodder, when veterans of our past wars are maligned and slandered and libeled from one end of this country to the other now, and disabled veterans are discharged from United States hospitals in their underwear, the clothing they wore in the hospital being taken from them before they are set out on the streets? Where does Mr. Roosevelt expect to get the men, the soldiers, the sailors, the marines to fight these foreign wars and to back up these treaties, this consultative pact that he proposes to enter into? Where does he expect to get the money, the finance?

We have enough to do to attend to our business here, Mr. President. We have difficult problems here. Where does Mr. Roosevelt expect to get the money and the men? Perhaps this question has not occurred to him.

I know not what may be in the Presidential mind, but I have complete confidence in the good sense of the American people, and I am certain that at the earliest opportunity they will definitely and completely repudiate any such plan as that announced from Geneva by Mr. Davis.

I yield now to my friend from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator is speaking about Mr. Davis, and where he gets his appointment. I do not believe the Senator has been reading the newspapers. Is it not possible that Mr. Davis might be over there on a mission connected with the House of Morgan? In that event he would not only be representing the two parties and the American Government, but probably England as well. I do not think the Senator is fair.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think there is a lot in what the Senator says. I am wondering whom Mr. Davis represents in Europe. Someone has called him our "mythical ambassador at large." Undoubtedly he is not an ambassador. I never heard of his nomination having been sent to the Senate. I never heard of the Senate's having confirmed him as an ambassador. For whom is he an ambassador? He has apparently no authority; he is a traveling free agent there, making wild statements about what the United States proposes to do, departing from our traditional policy of 150 years; suddenly, in the midst of these remarkable statements, it develops that he is on one of the two confidential lists of Mr. Morgan and has been for years; that he is today obligated to the House of Morgan in a considerable sum—today, at this moment. Well, if that be true, can he be representing the House of Morgan over there?

It would be interesting to know some of these things. Mr. Morgan has a house in London—Morgan, Grenfell & Co., I believe. Mr. Morgan stated on the witness stand that Mr. Grenfell is a member of Parliament, elected from London, according to the press. He also stated, if I remember correctly, that Mr. Grenfell is a director in the Bank of England. He is the head of the Morgan House in London; and it is generally understood, I think, undenied, that the House of Morgan is the fiscal agent for the British Government.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. Is not the House of Morgan the fiscal agent for the American Government?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Apparently so, Mr. President.

I notice this morning a headline in the press, as follows:

Woodin offered stocks for half of market price. Letter from partner in firm called him "one of our close friends."

I think I will read just a little of this:

How J. P. Morgan & Co. considered William H. Woodin, now Secretary of the Treasury, "one of our close friends" and wanted Woodin to know the partnership was "thinking of you" was revealed yesterday at the Senate inquiry.

Woodin was solicited on a list of "close friends" by Morgan & Co. to buy a 1,000-share block of stock at $20 a share. It was then selling on the market at from $35 to $37, making it possible for Woodin to realize an immediate $16,000 profit if he wished.

Mr. President, that is the way they fleece the lambs. A few, representing organized wealth in America, get in on the ground floor, and are given the stock at $20 a share. They have an artificial market for the stock at $35 to $40 per share. Then they solicit the lambs they expect to fleece, and there were 21,000,000 of them at the time of the blow-up in 1929. These 21,000,000 go in and buy those securities for the price of $35 to $50 a share, when the insiders, the little crowd represented in the National Economy League and in organized wealth generally—big business—have obtained this stock, they being on a confidential list, for $20 a share. They then sell at the market and increase their swollen fortunes. Thus the lambs are fleeced. That is why we are in the trouble we are in today. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, investigating the Harriman National Bank in New York—I have the honor to be serving on the same committee with the junior Senator from Mississippi—knows of the skulduggery that goes on in big business; and he knows, and we all know, why today the people have so little confidence in the banks of the country and in the financial interests that have been directing the country to its ruin during the past 10 or 12 years.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will yield, if the Senator will permit me to finish the article I was reading.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to make a suggestion just in line with the article.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The article continues:

A letter from partner William Ewing, of Morgan & Co., under date of February 1, 1929, introduced in evidence by Senate Counsel Pecora, read in part:

"DEAR MR. WOODIN: You may have seen in the paper that we recently made a public offering of $35,000,000 of Allegheny Corporation 15-year 5-percent bonds, which went very well.

"In this connection the Guarantee Co. offered today $25,000,000 Allegheny Corporation 5½-percent preferred stock. There was a strong demand for this stock.

"The Guarantee Co. also sold privately some of the common at $24 a share.

"We have kept for our own investment some of the common stock"—

"We have kept for our own investment some of the common stock"—

"at a cost of $20 a share, and although we are making no public offering of this stock, as it is not the class of security we wish to offer publicly, we are asking some of our close friends if they would not like some of the stock at the same price it is costing us—$20 a share.

"I believe that the stock is selling in the market around $35 to $37 a share, which means very little except that people wish to speculate."

The "lambs" again, the "lambs." The article continues:

"We are reserving for you 1,000 shares at $20 a share, if you would like it.

"There are no strings tied to the stock, so you can sell it whenever you wish.

"For further information regarding this corporation I am enclosing a circular.

"We just want you to know that we were thinking of you in this connection and thought you might like to have a little of this stock at the same price we are paying for it. * * *

The remainder of the letter expressed wishes that Woodin, then executive of the American Car & Foundry Co., would enjoy a pleasant trip through the Panama Canal. Accompanying was a photostat of a letter acknowledging receipt of a $20,033.33 check from Woodin, indicating acceptance of the Morgan offer.

The stock subsequently sold over $50 a share and then almost down to $1 a share. Woodin's eventual profits depended on what disposition he made of the purchase.

Mr. President, I think that answers the question of the Senator from Louisiana. He wondered whether the House of Morgan was the fiscal agent for both the British Government and the American Government. Apparently it is, because Mr. Davis, heavily obligated to the House of Morgan, is now abroad undertaking to overturn policies a century and a half old, traditional American policies, and to foist on this Nation extremely dangerous policies which are satisfactory to the House of Morgan. Everybody knows he wants the debts canceled; everybody knows he would have us in the League of Nations and its subsidiary, or back door, the World Court. Everybody knows he would have us bolster up Europe with our own men, our own blood, and our own treasure.

Now it develops that that is not only true but there is also a close friend in the Treasury—to quote the language of the House of Morgan, "our close friend"—who had a thousand shares reserved for him at $20 a share when the "lambs", 21,000,000 investors among the investing public of America, were charged $35 to $50 a share. Now the stock is selling at around a dollar a share.

Imagine that! Does that answer the Senator's question? I imagine, perhaps, that the House of Morgan is the fiscal agent for this Government. The House of Morgan seems to be the fiscal agent of both the British Government and the American Government. Of course Mr. Davis should be brought back from Europe immediately. The American people can have no further confidence in him. He should be recalled; and, of course, we should not ratify what he has said or done. Mr. Woodin, too, is occupying an unenviable position at the moment, with the vast powers of the Treasury, which in their administration call for the confidence of the people to be lodged squarely behind him. He cannot command the confidence of the American people now; therefore his usefulness as Secretary of the Treasury has ended.

I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I was going to call the Senator's attention to the fact that, notwithstanding the fact that the House of Morgan may be the fiscal agents of Great Britain, apparently the Parliament of the British Government is not so tender with them as the American Congress has been, with reference to their income taxes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator is quite right.

Mr. WHEELER. It will be noted that the House of Morgan pay income taxes in Great Britain, but they pay none in the United States; and my understanding is that one of the reasons for that, at least, is that the British Parliament has not seen fit to let these financiers deduct their capital losses, whereas the Government of the United States has permitted that to be done. If we here in the United States prevented those men from deducting their capital losses, as has the British Parliament, we would probably have money enough in the Treasury of the United States to meet the debts confronting us at the present time, rather than having to go out and try to impose a sales tax, or to impose a further tax upon the small taxpayers of this country. It would undoubtedly solve the needs of the unemployed of this country today. It seems to me that if the investigation now in process has not done anything else, it has shown the difference between the British system in dealing with these financiers and the way our own Congress and our own Government have dealt with them.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I may suggest in this connection, too, that the Internal Revenue Department is right in the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury directs all of the income-tax collection activities, the collection of the internal revenue of the country.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, that was one of the reasons why practically all of the great newspapers of the country were saying that Mr. Mellon was the greatest Secretary of the Treasury of the United States since Alexander Hamilton, during his term of office.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, insofar as I am concerned, I would not in the slightest degree attempt to shield any of them, regardless of their politics. The House of Morgan has no politics; it is neither Republican nor Democratic. It has its agents, and it has them all over the world, and I have every reason to believe, from many of the disclosures that have come about, that the agents obey orders, whether they be in this country or abroad.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say on this question, except that I think it has been a definite shock to the Nation to find that J. Pierpont Morgan was too poor to pay any income tax for the past 3 years, but that at the same time he could find money enough to pay an income tax in England.

It is high time we should take care. The American people have been patient and long suffering. Mr. President, feeble though my influence may be, insignificant though any efforts of mine seem, I nevertheless warn big business in this country to have a care while they continue to trifle with the millions and hundreds of millions of toiling Americans, who during the past 3 years have experienced hardship, suffering, and sacrifice, as no other people have, probably, in the history of the world.

I have in my hand an editorial comment from the New York Evening Sun dated May 23, 1933; an editorial reprint also from the New York Evening Post dated May 23, 1933, an editorial comment from the Washington Times, and an editorial from the New York American of this morning, which I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH BY DAVIS ENDS UNITED STATES ISOLATION, SAY NEW YORK PAPERS—SUN QUESTIONS HIS AUTHORITY TO SPEAK FOR AMERICA; POST STATES ADDRESS MAY LEAD TO TROUBLE WITH JAPAN

WHAT IS DAVIS' AUTHORITY?

[From New York Evening Sun, May 23, 1933]

Communication between the State Department at Washington and its special ambassador at Geneva seems astonishingly bad. Norman H. Davis' speech yesterday so far transcended the interpretation of American policy given out at the White House last week as to suggest that he may have taken the oratorical bit between his teeth and run away. The White House declared that there was no intention to depart from historic American policy with regard to consultation among nations in the event that any agreement reached at Geneva were hereafter broken. That policy would require the United States to judge each separate breach upon its own merits and take such action as circumstances might prescribe.

Who gives Mr. Davis authority to repudiate on behalf of the United States the American doctrine of neutrality which has been a cornerstone of American foreign policy for a hundred and fifty years? Who gives him authority to pledge the United States to wield a rubber stamp validating the decrees of any group of foreign nations? By what right does he presume to declare in advance the action this Nation shall take in regard to some putative violator of a putative treaty? Who are the "we" of whom he speaks with such glibness?

Plenipotentiaries abroad among whom the proposed agreements are to be reached ought to be informed that Mr. Davis is making promises which no American has authority to make on behalf of the United States, promises which in all probability the United States Senate would refuse to ratify.

[From New York Evening Post, May 23, 1933]

WHITHER?

To the Times the speech of Norman H. Davis, chief delegate of the United States to the Disarmament Conference at Geneva seems merely a following up of President Roosevelt's message to the world last week. To the Herald Tribune it appears to be only something wherewith to bridge over the summer's negotiations. To us it stands out as one of the most astoundingly important statements ever made affecting the world fate of the United States.

It puts us into the affairs of Europe. It may let other nations force us into trouble with Japan. It reverses our Senate's rejection of article X and the Covenant of the League of Nations. It practically makes us a part of the League. It ends our world isolation. It is a triumph for Woodrow Wilson.

The direct undertakings, and above all, the implied obligations in these proposals seem to us to alter the whole world position of the United States, as it has existed since the days that Washington warned us against the peril of entangling alliances. We no longer base our armament upon the needs of our national defense but upon faith in other nations.

We may have to give up neutrality and probably freedom of the seas.

How anyone can say that these proposals do not affect the very life of America itself we cannot see.

[From the Times, Washington, D.C., May 24, 1933]

SENATE, NOT MR. DAVIS, TO DECIDE FOREIGN POLICY

By James T. Williams, Jr.

According to a press dispatch from Geneva, "Norman H. Davis, American ambassador at large", has offered on behalf of the United States to "abandon its traditional policy of isolation."

There are several errors in this report. In the first place, Mr. Davis is not "an American ambassador at large." There is no such American envoy at large.

Moreover, Mr. Davis is not an ambassador at all. He has never been nominated to the Senate for that office, and unless so nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, he cannot be an American ambassador anywhere.

Mr. Davis is only an agent of the Executive branch of the Government. In that capacity he is representing that branch as our delegate at the League conference for the limitation and reduction of armaments. Therefore he speaks not for the Government of the United States but only as an agent of one of its branches.

MYTHICAL AMBASSADOR—NONEXISTENT POLICY

The second error in this report is the alleged abandonment by a mythical ambassador of a so-called "American policy" that never existed. The so-called policy of "isolation", which Mr. Davis is supposed to have renounced for us before the League conference, is not traditional either in American theory or in American practice.

Our traditional foreign policy is an inheritance from George Washington. He bequeathed it to us in the farewell address.

In that immortal legacy the Father of his Country thus advised his people:

"Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. . . ."

"The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible."

Because Europe "must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concern," Washington believed that it "must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities."

THE FRUITS OF WASHINGTON'S POLICY

And the promise of Washington was that if we would heed his warning, cherish his counsel, and act upon his advice, the time would soon come—

" . . . when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving of us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interests, guided by justice, shall counsel."

And all American history proves him right.

The great objective of this policy was, as Washington wrote Patrick Henry, when he offered him the Secretaryship of State in 1796, to make us as a nation "respected abroad and happy at home."

This was not a policy of "isolation" for a hermit nation. It was a policy designed to insulate us against any entanglement of "our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice."

John Hay, who was the Secretary of State in the Cabinet of two Presidents—William McKinley and Theodore Roosevelt—once said that the two cardinal principles of American foreign policy were "the Golden Rule and the Monroe Doctrine."

By following Washington's policy and refusing to meddle in European quarrels and intrigues, we were only doing unto others as we would that they should do unto us.

NATIONAL BIRTHRIGHT OR MESS OF POTTAGE

This is Washington's policy. And its corollary is the Monroe Doctrine, by which we put Europe on notice that she meddles in the political life of this hemisphere at her peril.

Washington's policy was the policy of Adams and Jefferson, of Madison and Monroe, of Andrew Jackson and Abraham Lincoln, of Grover Cleveland and Theodore Roosevelt, and Calvin Coolidge.

After the Great War, the attempt was made at the Versailles Conference to swap our traditional foreign policy—our national birthright—for an European mess of pottage in the form of an entangling alliance called "the League of Nations."

By luring us into that alliance, Europe sought to obtain our aid in enforcing the terms of the Versailles Treaty and to use American blood and treasure to guarantee Europe's national boundaries.

But this proposed exchange of America's birthright for Europe's mess of pottage was stopped when our Senators in Congress refused to ratify the Treaty of Versailles, which included the covenant of the League of Nations.

By this refusal the United States reaffirmed the policy of Washington and the Monroe Doctrine as America's permanent foreign policy. By this reaffirmation we put the world on notice that we would not meddle in European politics and that it would be wise for Europe not to meddle in the politics of the Western World.

THE VERDICT RESTS WITH THE SENATE

This is the traditional foreign policy which has been renounced for the United States, not by its Government, but by an agent of that Government's executive branch. And the Europe which bestowed upon him the high-sounding title of American ambassador at large is the same Europe which slanders our traditional foreign policy of insulation against the quarrels and intrigues of European politics by falsely branding it as "a policy of isolation."

In justice to Mr. Davis it must be assumed that his renunciation of America's traditional foreign policy from the days of George Washington until now was made with the full authority and approval of his immediate superior and fellow Tennessean, the Secretary of State, Mr. Hull.

The proposals of Mr. Davis, however, under the American system of government, must remain mere proposals of one branch of the Government pending final action upon them by that other branch of the Government to which the Federal Constitution entrusts the final control of our foreign policy—the United States Senate.

Whether the American people are now willing to swap the "Golden Rule and the Monroe Doctrine" for the rule of Europe's League and the Hull-Davis doctrine is the all-important question that must await the verdict of the representatives of the American people in the United States Senate.

[From New York American of May 25, 1933]

THE SUPINE SURRENDER OF AMERICAN PRINCIPLES AT GENEVA

A rather bad day for America, fellow citizens!

We refer, of course, to what took place on Monday at the Geneva Disarmament Conference.

We thought the Washington Disarmament Conference, when Secretary of State Hughes, without offset or recompense, sank the newest and finest ships in the American Navy, marked the limit of injury to the United States which could be self-inflicted.

It was nothing, however, compared to the amazing surrender at Geneva of our country's strength and security made in the name of the American people by a spokesman who no more speaks their wishes, convictions, or purposes than the man in the moon.

The first official act of George Washington, upon inauguration as the first President of the United States, was the declaration of America's neutrality in the wars then convulsing Europe.

In the century and a half of the Nation's life the policy of neutrality in conflicts to which we were not a party has protected us from the ravages of recurring wars, exempted us from the passions engendered by them, and assured our peaceful growth and development as a nation.

On Monday at Geneva this wise and beneficent principle of American policy was tossed to the winds.

And with it that most American of principles—the freedom of the seas.

To relinquish this natural and, to a maritime power such as the United States, essential right will be regarded by the American people as the most abject of surrenders. On more than one occasion in the past we have gone to war in defense of this right. And we will go again if need be. Its surrender will never be tolerated or condoned.

The oft-repeated refusal of the United States to bind itself in a consultative pact with Europe, and thus make itself a party and a judge in the innumerable, incessant, and clouded controversies of that feud-infested continent, was forgotten in a moment.

Without mandate from the people, without even their knowledge, without warning to Congress, and without an opportunity afforded either the Senate or House to speak, it is stated on behalf of the unsuspecting United States that "we are willing to consult the other states in case of a threat to peace."

Like children playing with firearms, the improvised statesmanship of the hour ignores the lessons of our history, rejects the warnings of experience, defies the restraints of the Constitution, and whirls us to the brink of untold disaster.

Should war break out—and sober opinion regards war, under the surcharged conditions now prevailing in the world, as an almost certain eventuality—we have involved ourselves in that most difficult and dangerous of undertakings—the designation of the aggressor.

What happens to us upon such designation is left in apparent obscurity, but it is only apparent. What we say is that we will "refrain" from any action tending to defeat the collective efforts of the nations who join with us in such designation.

But the consequences to us of taking part in so dangerous an operation are not limited by our declarations of intention. Such a designation would be deeply resented by the nation so designated and would certainly be regarded as an act of war, particularly if our abstention from the assertion of neutral rights were interpreted as giving support to such designation by an overt act of hostility. This would be entirely reasonable, as the departure from the conduct of a neutral could not fail to be regarded as the conduct of a belligerent. We should be charged, and rightly, with having cast the weight of our attitude against a nation from whom we had received neither provocation nor injury.

In addition to these objections to the tenor and substance of the Geneva statement of America's altered policy there hangs over it a sickening insincerity of interpretation.

It is evidently the purpose of the administration to convince France and Germany of our intention to guarantee their mutual peace and security by concrete and definite collaboration and support.

Although we invite this interpretation in Europe, it is not at all the conclusion which we ask our own people to draw.

While the London Times refers to the Democratic administration as proposing to change the traditional attitude of the United States toward the whole question of neutrality and freedom of the seas, Secretary Hull, on the other hand, regards the Geneva statement as reserving to the United States Government full liberty of judgment and action.

It is open to question who are the more deceived—the people of Europe or the people of the United States.

We can say this, however—the people of the United States will not long be deceived.

They are a hard-headed people. They know how to effectuate their will and how on occasion to manifest their resentment if convinced that American principles have been betrayed or American interests compromised.

They are children of the day, not of the night nor of the darkness. They watch and are sober.

They do not propose that sudden destruction shall come upon them as a thief in the night.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is not present, but I should like also at this time to have incorporated in the Record a letter written by Prof. Edwin M. Borchard, of Yale University, addressed to Hon. KEY PITTMAN, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, a copy of which I understand was sent to each member of the committee. In the absence of the Senator from Nevada, however, I shall not ask to have the letter incorporated without his permission. I should like to have it understood that if I can gain his permission to have the letter placed in the Record that may be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in the year 1914 we did not have ambassadors going about Europe trying to establish peace in the world. In 1914, nevertheless, a right fair war began, and although we remained at home for about 2½ years, before that war was over we had a national debt of $20,000,000,000, and had transported about 2,000,000 men across the seas to try to preserve the rights and the property of American citizens. Staying away from Europe in 1914 did not keep us out of the war, and going to Europe now, in 1933, is more calculated, in my humble judgment, to keep us out of war than to get us into war.

I can remember 3 or 4 weeks ago when the soberest minds in this Chamber were of the opinion that war in Europe was almost a certainty. The great leader who is in the White House addressed a message to the governments of the world, and pointed out the folly of another war, with the world in an economic situation such as now confronts it, and almost overnight the leader of the German Republic retreated from a speech of a few days before, and amity was reestablished, temporarily at least, and a better feeling existed between the governments of the world.

Suppose that message had not been forthcoming; suppose Europe had gone to war; how hollow would be the words of the Senator from Indiana now with all of the countries of the Continent of Europe, in view of the poison gas of the last war, and the imminence of disease germs in the next, if another conflict had unfolded through silence on the part of this Government.

I think Mr. Davis, whether he made a loan or did not make a loan, has shown a stature of statesmanship for which this world is hungry. Everyone knows that we cannot attain disarmament through one nation acting alone, that armaments are comparative, and each nation keeps an army and a navy because another nation, forsooth, keeps an army and a navy.

Is it too much to ask that the most powerful nation in the world—and that is what we claim for our country—should have no responsibility in establishing peace, in furthering international trade, in stabilizing currency, in adjusting the world's problems? Are we going to play the ostrich and stick our heads in the sand until the prairie fire scorches our tail feathers? Or shall we keep our heads toward the sky and view what is going on by the exercise of calm judgment and avert another world conflict, if possible?

It is regrettable, in my judgment, that the Congress does not support rather than decry the efforts of this administration to establish peace in the world and to settle international difficulties in a proper way, rather than by a resort to arms. I am not afraid of our going to Europe or to say that I believe in international cooperation. We did not go to Europe in 1914, but we went there before 1918, with money and men and treasure, and that is the precedent that shows that wars are not to be avoided by isolation, by the silly policy of remaining at home while fires break out all around us. If you lived in a house in a city block with fires commencing on either end, would you sit there and twiddle your thumbs or would you join with others in helping to put those fires out?

Further than that, let us not lose sight of the fact that for the last 12 years we have been selling to foreign peoples about $5,000,000,000 worth of American-made goods every year, one tenth of our whole production. Therefore, if we sold them one tenth of the production of the commodities of our farms and our mines and our factories, one tenth of all the people employed were working to make and produce the goods to be sold abroad; and if we had 50,000,000 workers, which we have in this country, then 5,000,000 of them earned their bread and butter by making the goods to sell to foreign nations. The reason we have unemployment today is because we are no longer selling those goods to foreign nations in the quantities with which we formerly supplied foreign markets.

We ought to be applauding the efforts of the President to reestablish world trade and to reconcile the differences of nations by means other than war. The man who attacks his ambassador abroad, when that ambassador is making signal successes in accomplishing better international feeling in the promise of some disarmament, is attacking humanity; he is attacking the sons and daughters of every man and woman in this country, because he is sowing the seed of international hate; he is sowing the seed of international ill will; and that is the food upon which wars thrive and grow. I think we have had enough of silly attacks upon our foreign neighbors, decrying them here in this Chamber; and yet we would be the first to rise here and repel any attack upon our own Government that sprang from the floor of any other parliament than our own. Foreign peoples are sensitive; they have pride; and these short-visioned attacks about a lot of scheming going on, in my judgment, are not calculated to help the situation.

Mr. Davis needs no defense from me. We sent him abroad to negotiate a disarmament treaty, and he has been the most efficient negotiator who has been sent to that conference from any government on the face of this earth. Four or five times there have been possibilities of a rank failure on the part of that conference, but Mr. Davis, with an energy which was unparalleled, with an intensity that might be imitated, has gone on and rebuilt the structure himself, and has kept the nations in conference through conciliatory and advantageous proposals.

This world wants disarmament; it wants an end to war, if it is possible to achieve it. That cannot be obtained by sitting down and doing nothing. Like any other worthwhile thing in life, you have got to work for it if you want to get it; and I, for one, do not intend to sit here day after day and see the efforts of a man who, apparently, is giving everything he has to accomplish some measure of disarmament, belittled, particularly by members of the Government that he purports to represent in the councils of the world.

THE "BAREFOOT" SOUTH

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, on account of the arduous duties which have fallen to the lot of every Senator, I have been unable to keep intimately in touch with every one of the various plans that have been advanced to speed economic recovery and rehabilitate our labor and general economic conditions. This morning I did note the most ingenious plan I have yet seen advanced. It is brought forward by our very able and distinguished Secretary of Labor, Miss Perkins, who is reported in the press as having stated in an address which she delivered in New York City that if one would enter into the shoe-manufacturing business in the South and teach the people of the South to wear shoes they would find that business a veritable gold mine. The headlines of two outstanding papers published in a southern city heralded the account of this speech by saying that the "South is virtually shoeless, Labor Secretary declares", while the other one headlined it "South barefooted. Frances Perkins, Labor Secretary, sees social revolution in wearing of shoes."

Mr. President, I should dislike very much to remove any windmill on which the distinguished Secretary might splinter a lance, but I can assure her that the people of the South do wear shoes. As is pointed out in an editorial which also contained this news account printed in the State which it is my honor to represent, there are shoe factories in my State that produce as many as 30,000 pairs of shoes a week.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator think he could go a little farther and state that the people of the South do wear shoes?

Mr. RUSSELL. I was coming to that point in a moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have been living in the South for many years and I want to say in all fairness to the people down there that I have not seen a barefooted person in my part of the country for many years.

Mr. RUSSELL. I should like to say in reply to the Senator from Tennessee that it is true at the present time that many of our shoes are much worn and have been often repaired. In fact, many of us, in common parlance, are "on our uppers" now, but still we do wear shoes.

The purpose of my brief remarks is merely to invite the distinguished and able Secretary of Labor down to the South in order that she might ascertain for herself the conditions that actually obtain there.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I call the attention of the able Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] that many people are asserting that we are entering upon a new dispensation. Some insist that it is a new epoch which calls for a repudiation of the social, economic, and, indeed, the political policies of the past, and that the policies of government announced by Jefferson and other founders of the Republic, it is asserted by protagonists of this new school, are no longer of any use, that local government is no longer in fashion—indeed, it is not to be tolerated—and that the States are to be compounded into one great mass and their sovereign rights and prerogatives abolished.

This school of thought, as I am advised, contends that the Federal Government, with the enormous powers which are to be assumed by it and the agencies in existence or to be created, is to take over the functions of the State, and establish a new social order, a new political system, and exercise control over our entire social and economic system. This, it is contended, is to be a social revolution, the object of which is to place not only business, but the lives and activities of the people under the control of agencies and bureaus set up by the Federal Government.

Social reformers and those who have but little regard for individualism or the competency of the people to govern themselves, or the ability of individuals to steer their own course in life, it is urged, must now take charge of the lives and activities and conduct and business affairs of the people and, indeed, their habits, and direct their thoughts and control individual, family, and local life.

Some individuals who are advocates of this philosophy are seeking positions in the Federal Government and are earnestly working to obtain authority to put the same into practice. They seem to regard it as proper under this new social revolution, which they insist has come or is near at hand, that Federal agencies and an army of protagonists of this cult, shall enter into all the communities and, indeed, into the very homes of the people and direct how people shall live and act and think and conduct themselves and the character, training, and education which they shall enjoy or possess. Indeed, that they shall supervise the entire conduct of the people of the United States.

Our theory of government given to us by the fathers, has developed a strong, reliant, and patriotic people. Under that system, the foundations of democratic institutions were laid. There are those now who would destroy the fruits of the labors of our fathers and superimpose upon the American people an oppressive socialism and a despotic bureaucracy. Initiative and self-reliance and all those fine qualities essential to a progressive civilization are to be eliminated from our political system.

It is to be hoped that those who hold positions and have sworn to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States, will not attempt to impose upon the American people, alien institutions and socialistic policies, the consequences of which will be destructive of constitutional government.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, let me say to the distinguished Senator from Utah that the very purpose of calling attention to this matter is to get the Secretary of Labor to pry and probe around in the South in order to inform herself of conditions there. I can assure her that the statement is not correct, as she is quoted by the Associated Press—I presume it is correctly quoted—that "a social revolution will take place if you put shoes on the people of the South." This editorial I hold in my hand and shall have inserted in the RECORD attributes this statement to a "quaint sense of humor."

I hope the Secretary of Labor will see fit to visit the South. I assure her that a crowd will not gather on the streets to view her leather-clad feet as anything out of the ordinary or as any rare phenomena. She will not find, in any of the rural sections, the citizens all shamelessly wiggling their bare toes in the soil; and she will further find that in the cities our people do not expose the soles of their bare feet to the hot pavements.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this editorial from the Atlanta Journal of May 24, 1933, entitled "The 'Barefoot' South," be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Atlanta Journal of May 24, 1933]

THE "BAREFOOT" SOUTH

Though we have long admired the formidable talents of Miss Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, we must confess that not till now were we aware of her quaint sense of humor. What delightful drollery there is in her remarks on the barefoot South! In a speech to the girls' work section of the Welfare Council of New York City she said, if the Associated Press reports her aright:

"Those of you who have lived all your lives in communities where the wearing of shoes is a commonplace have, perhaps, forgotten how important and significant a social contribution are shoes. When you realize that the whole South of this country is an untapped market for shoes, you realize we haven't yet reached the end of the social benefits and the social good that may come from the further development of the mass-production system on a basis of consuming power of the South, which will make possible the universal use of shoes in the South. * * * A social revolution will take place if you put shoes on the people of the South."

Some there are, including her New York audience, who may have taken seriously these broad satirical comments of the distinguished Secretary of Labor. If so, we invite them to come to Dixie and learn to laugh. At Buford, Ga., they will be welcomed by the Bona Allen Co., one of the largest leather-goods industries in America, which is turning out 30,000 pairs of shoes a week. In Atlanta they will find the J. K. Orr Co. producing upward of a thousand pairs a day; at Lynchburg, Va., the famous Craddock-Terry Co.; in Nashville, Tenn., two factories of major proportions; and in divers other parts of the South makers of all sorts of shoes, to say nothing of hundreds of importing jobbers and thousands of retail dealers.

It is not our intent to trespass upon the province of statistics, in which Secretary Perkins is, of course, a past master. But for the benefit of those who may not be as well informed as she, we say plainly that southerners do wear shoes. They commonly take them off when they go to bed and when they go swimming, but during the rest of the four-and-twenty hours they tread neat's leather. This they have done for longer than we can remember. A poet of ante-bellum days rhymed of the southern girl in this wise:

Her boots are slim and neat,
She is vain about her feet,
It is said,
She amputates her r's
But her eyes are like the stars Overhead.

And, curiously enough, in the same issue of the Journal which published an account of Secretary Perkins' New York speech, a gifted Georgia author, in describing the colored people's observance of "Mancipation" Day in a southern town, wrote thus: "Merchants and grocers expected a large trade, and were not disappointed, in crackers, sardines, cheese, tobacco, fruit—and bedroom slippers. The reason for that last item is that almost all the colored people wore new shoes; and when the hot May sunshine poured down on paved sidewalks, the proud possessor of the patent-leather footgear was forced to ease her pedal extremities by removing the offending glories, substituting rose, blue, or green felt boudoir slippers and walking unconcernedly down the street with the original offenders in her hands."

Such is life and such is humor in the unsophisticated South. We do hope that Secretary Perkins will do us the honor and herself the justice of an early visit.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, first of all I wish to express my gratitude to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] for calling attention to this matter.

When I first saw in the Associated Press a statement purporting to report verbatim an address by our Secretary of Labor in New York City to the girls' work section of the Welfare Council of New York, in which she made these statements about our people in the South, I had some sense of resentment; but I am not going to speak in that sense.

Somehow, Mr. President, we people from the South have had great difficulty in getting before the rest of the people of our country anything like a fair conception of the civilization there. Every now and then I read miserable and contemptible statements about our mountain people. They are spoken of as "the poor mountain whites"; and miserable grafters go around the country taking up collections to assist those people from the depths of degradation which they attribute to them.

As a matter of fact, civilization has reached no higher point in America than it has amongst the people of the Appalachian system, called our mountain country. It was Mr. Galsworthy, who lately died—a notable novelist and a most distinguished representative of this English civilization of which we are the heirs, and in a way representative—who, upon a visit to our mountain country just 2 years ago, prolonged his stay in those mountains in order that he might drink, as he himself said, "once again from the fresh springs of English life and civilization".

And now our Secretary of Labor makes this extraordinary statement, I am sure with no malice and with no intention to offend; and I am sure of myself that I am without intention to be offended and that I am speaking for a people who have a profound respect for themselves and too much respect to protest; a people who will not be offended, either, because in the security of their self-respect they are immune from misunderstanding and likewise from ignorance.

I am going to read in the Senate of the United States what our Secretary of Labor has said, in the hope that I may bring not merely to her attention but to the attention of all men and women who are here something of the truth, nothing by way of resentment, but only by way of facts.

Here is what she said:

As an example, Miss Perkins cited the South as a market for shoes. "Those of you who have lived all your lives in communities where the wearing of shoes is a commonplace," Miss Perkins said, "have perhaps forgotten how important and significant a social contribution are shoes. When you realize that the whole South of this country is an untapped market for shoes you realize we haven't yet reached the end of the social benefits and the social good that may come from the further development of the mass-production system on a basis of consuming power of the South which will make possible the universal use of shoes."

[Laughter.]

Why, Mr. President, even the mules in the South wear shoes. [Laughter.]

I have said in the last few weeks, as we have been discussing the bills in Washington which have been proposed for the revival of industry, and which, among other things, provide for the fixing of hours of work and for the fixing of minimum rates of pay, that if the minimum rates of pay and the hours of work could be fixed in the southern mills and in the southern employments generally, those who wanted to get rich quick ought to buy a shoe factory; for the opportunity of buying shoes by people who may have their wages, for the first time in a generation—

Mark the words—

For the first time in a generation, come to the level of living wages, is perfectly enormous; and a social revolution—

Think of it, Mr. President! We are on the edge of a "social revolution." God speed the day!

A social revolution will take place if you put shoes on the people of the South.

[Laughter.]

Mr. President, when I read that, I thought about my knowledge of the Southern country. I thought about my own barefooted boyhood. I thought about many things, Mr. President; and then it occurred to me that I would get the facts from the Census Bureau, and read them into the Record, as to shoes. Here they are.

Total sales of shoes and other footwear for the year 1929—that being the latest year; figures furnished by the distribution division of the Bureau of the Census:

Florida, $12,531,338 for shoes; population, 1,468,000. That is $9 for every man, woman, and child in Florida for shoes; and Florida is a hot country. I do not blame a Florida boy for going barefooted in the summer, and I would not care if he went barefooted in the winter.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Would it shock the piety of the Senator from North Carolina if I should interject a remark to the effect that when I grew up as a boy we did not care a tinker's damn for a boy who wore shoes? We regarded him as a sissy and would not associate with him.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator; and, since the Senator has made a personal remark, may I be forgiven for making a remark that my own little boy, 10 years of age, was the only boy in the city schools of Raleigh this year who wore no shoes, and it was no shame to any of us.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I should like to observe that in the event an effort is made to force the people of the South to wear shoes by legislative fiat, I am gratified to know that the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from North Carolina will at least seek exemptions permitting those under 14 to go barefooted in the summertime.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to make an observation?

Mr. BAILEY. Since I mentioned Florida and shoes, I will yield to the senior Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is a very considerable colored population down there who would regard it as a distinct punishment to be required to wear shoes the year around.

Mr. BAILEY. Since we are getting into personal matters, I believe I will add that when I brought my boy here last year, and he had to wear shoes, it nearly broke my heart to see the suffering he had to endure because he was in Washington and had to wear shoes; and when he got home there would have been no power on earth that could bring him back up here, wholly because he had to wear shoes in Washington. [Laughter.]

Let me go on a little more seriously.

Georgia, $20,217,368 for shoes; population, 2,900,000; which is $6.50 for every man, woman, and child in Georgia for shoes.

North Carolina, $22,225,491 for shoes; and a population of 3,170,000; which is $7 for every man, woman, and child that year for shoes. If shoes will make a social revolution, then we already have had one in North Carolina and did not know it. [Laughter.]

South Carolina spent for shoes $9,215,797; population, 1,738,000; or $5 per capita.

Virginia, $15,840,148 for shoes; population, 2,421,000; which is $7 per capita for shoes in Virginia.

Alabama, $17,124,439 for shoes; population, 2,646,248; which is $7 per capita.

Mississippi, $14,312,411 for shoes; population, 2,000,000; $7 per capita for shoes for every man, woman, and child, white and colored, rich and poor.

Louisiana—

Mr. LONG. Now you are coming to something. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. For shoes, $14,912,640 against a population of 2,101,000, which is $7 per capita for shoes.

Texas, $52,300,949, against a population of 5,824,000—an average in Texas of $9 for shoes.

Mr. President, that is a sufficient showing. There is no reason for resentment. People are foolish who resent the manifestations of ignorance. It is a matter of sympathy, and not of resentment.

I can make a comparison here, if the Senator from New York will permit me, and I assure him in advance that I do not intend to violate rule XIX and reflect upon his State. The Secretary of Labor comes from New York State. The figures show that for shoes in New York $175,062,000 was spent in the same year, against a population of 12,588,000, which is $14 per capita, against the southern average of $8, and when we recall that we have the long summers, and that, as the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia has said, it is rather a shame in the South for a white boy or a Negro boy to wear shoes in the summer months, where they gather around their parents about the first of April and beg them to let them take off their shoes, and do not put them on again until about the first of October or of November or even December—when we consider our long season, when we consider our favored clime, I undertake to say that the South is today expending as much for shoes as are the people of New York per capita.

I remember the old song—and I will conclude this part of my remarks with it, a song I heard in one of the revival meetings:

I got shoes, and you got shoes,
All God's chillun got shoes;
When I get to heaven I'm goin' to put on my shoes
And walk all over God's heaven.

I hope to have the good lady with me. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND rose.

Mr. BAILEY. I will yield, but I am not through. Does the Senator wish to interrupt me?

Mr. COPELAND. No.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought perhaps the Senator was going to make a speech on shoes in New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I intend to.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I will yield the floor, when the time comes, and let the Senator make his speech in defense of the shoe revolution in New York, or whatever he may call it. [Laughter.]

I have another word to say about this matter. There are statistics which tend to indicate that the people of the South are not as well off in this world's goods as are the people in other sections. I think there is some ground for the statistical position, but I think it is time that someone should say, and without prejudice and without offense, that there are reasonable grounds for that, and that the disparity in relative wealth is not due to the laziness of the southern people as some affect to think, not due to their worthlessness, as some would furtively insinuate, not due to labor conditions, either, as is intimated in this article here. I am here to say that there are reasons for the relative disparity.

Mr. President, before I go into those reasons, I want to point to one fact. The Southern States of the United States in the year 1930 had more of wealth, according to the census, than the entire United States had in the year 1890. Now, let that sink in. Here is a space of 40 years in which that land, which had been devastated by war, came forward with such rapidity that in 40 years 13 Southern States developed, created, and possessed more of wealth than the whole American Union possessed after 100 years of history ending with the year 1890.

Those people who think we are a backward people, and those people who think the southern people are incapable of great things, and those people who think that conditions are bad in the South, I ask, what will they say in the presence of the fact that the Southern States in the last 40 years created and now possess more wealth than the whole American Union did after 100 years ending in 1890?

Mark you, Mr. President, that immense progress was made under the most difficult of conditions, and I want you to hear that. We came out of the Civil War a ruined country. The property of our people had been taken, the values destroyed. The condition of Germany after the World War was not to compare with the condition of the South after the War between the States. The indemnity exacted of France by Germany after the Franco-Prussian War did not compare with the indemnity imposed upon the South by the American Union in the years that followed. France had no reconstruction; France had no carpetbaggers; France had no adverse taxes; France paid her indemnity and was free; but the fathers of my generation—my father—came out of that war and, in a desolated country and without advantage from the outside, rebuilt that civilization; and I could pledge to my country now in this hour that if she is in distress, that if she wishes to look from this present pit of despair to some star of hope in the sky, she can look to that history, to that people, and to that section with the assurance that the sons of the fathers who rebuilt that civilization after the Civil War will rebuild this one. We have down there enough of example and of inspiration to save the population of this continent.

Did we have adverse tariffs? Yes; the tariff laws were written against the agricultural South for 60 years; but we came up with that burden on our backs. Who paid the pensions of the Union soldiers?—and I do not begrudge them their pensions. In this very Congress Thad Stevens, of Pennsylvania, wrote the laws imposing the taxes upon the tobacco of the South, and he said on the floor of the House yonder that if that war terminated as he hoped it would, "these tax laws will pay the bill of the war"; and they did.

Virginia and North Carolina today turn in, by way of revenue on tobacco—which is collected throughout the country, and I do not intend to get around that fact at all—more taxes into the Federal Treasury than any other two States in the whole land, if we take out New York and Pennsylvania. North Carolina ranks second amongst the American States in the amount of taxes paid into the Federal Treasury, second only to New York. It is said the taxes on tobacco are collected around the whole country, and they are; but hear me, Senators, every dollar of the tax collected is an impost upon the tobacco in the fields of the farmer.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I regard the statement that the tax is paid all over the country as an utter delusion. It is paid right on the warehouse floor by the man who goes there to buy the tobacco.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator. I was taking the most liberal view, because, taking the most liberal view, the effect of the tax is precisely the same. It rests upon the tobacco in the patches on the farm, and that tobacco is on the hills of Virginia and of North Carolina. We turn into the Treasury every year from $250,000,000 to $400,000,000, and that is a Treasury which is getting only 4 or 5 times that sum from the whole American Union.

With an adverse tariff which laid its toll day by day upon everything the farmer bought, and paid him nothing whatever on the things he had to sell, and created this disparity, which has finally broken him down; with this additional toll upon his tobacco, hear me, that southern shoeless land has, nevertheless and notwithstanding, created, within the short space of 40 years, and now possesses, as much of wealth as the entire American Union had in the year 1890.

Mr. President, I hope that all men in the United States will learn the truth about the South, and that is all I ask that they do learn. I do not think the South should stand up and protest against this sort of thing. I think it becomes the southern people rather to go on with their business, and do their work, and create their great civilization. But I did hope that such an utterance as this would not come from the Cabinet of the President of the United States, and I could have devoutly prayed to be spared making such protest as I have made against an utterance like this from a member of a Democratic Cabinet.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BAILEY. I will yield in a moment. I do not see how I could have discharged my duty, with this utterance from the high official source from which it has come, and more especially, Mr. President, in view of the insinuation that it is now proposed to take charge of the industries of the South in order to create a market for shoes to be manufactured in the North, had I done less.

I have not finished with that. The southern people have asked no assistance from the Government, except such as has been generally granted here in the last two extraordinary years. We have come thus far on our own. Thank God, we are capable of going the rest of the way. Can we not at least ask that the official sources of the United States—whether they give us sympathy or not is not the question—will at least inform themselves before they undertake to create a social revolution amongst us by way of putting shoes on our feet?

Now I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, is this lady who has informed us about the shoeless South the person who is to be given jurisdiction under the so-called "industrial legislation"?

Mr. BAILEY. I would not be able to say what is going to happen along that line.

Mr. LONG. It looks to me as if the lady had better be sent to school. Somebody should teach her about something except manicuring sets, or something. Somebody ought to show her how to get in out of the rain before we turn her loose on the whole country.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I said in the beginning that I was not going to speak by way of any sense of offense. I would rather open the arms of the southern people to the lady Secretary of Labor and ask her to come down and see us, and I have some faint suspicion that if she would come, she would not only learn about shoes but that she would get a new schooling in the elementary principles of American life and government, and I know of nothing that is more needed than that at the present time.

If it was good for Galsworthy to come and drink from the springs of English civilization in our mountains, I think it would be worth while at just this moment for someone to go down to the land of the founders of the Republic—for we are not strangers here; I am in the house that the fathers built—to go down to the land of Washington and Jefferson, of Madison and Monroe, and John Marshall, to go down there and drink again from the great principles from which this Republic has drawn its life, by means of which it has lived to this good hour, and without which, for my part, I hesitate to say what the consequences would be.

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may we proceed now? We have spent 2 hours, and there has not been a word of comment on the banking measure. May I not plead with the Senator from New York to let us get along with the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. No; I will not ask the Senator to yield to me.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I shall not embarrass the Senator from Virginia, because what I say will be very brief.

Reference was made by my genial friend the able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] to my State of New York. I want to remind him that New York City in those awful days following the War between the States and the period of reconstruction was a firm friend and a very practical friend of the South. We have a large southern population in New York and have most congenial relationships, commercial and social, with the South.

I cannot respond in the same vein of humor and eloquence that was used by the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from North Carolina. But I do want to say that I think the Secretary of Labor has been misunderstood. Undoubtedly she was using but one example of the poverty which exists in all parts of our country, North and South.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to say that I sincerely hope that the Senator is correct in stating that the Secretary of Labor has been misquoted and that she will give the facts to the country, for I am quite sure that if she knew the facts she would not have made any such statement as that which has been quoted.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator from Tennessee is entirely right as regards the spirit of this good woman.

She need not have gone to the South for an example of poverty. I am sorry to say that in her city and my own city of New York there is greater poverty than can be found anywhere else on the continent. We have 1 square mile in New York City where live 500,000 persons, 12 living in 3 rooms, 4 sleeping in the kitchen every night. Nowhere else in our country is there greater poverty than exists in the city of New York. If we buy more shoes per capita, it is because they wear out faster on the sidewalks of New York, being worn by people walking to find jobs. I am sure that the Secretary of Labor had in her mind simply one example of many she might have used. I am confident that I know the heart of that good woman. Her greatest joy is to relieve distress and human suffering.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from New York?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. Assuming that all the Senator from New York has said is true, there is no foundation for the example. That is my point.

Mr. COPELAND. That may well be, and perhaps if the Secretary of Labor had used more thought, she would not have cited that particular example and, unless she was misquoted, would have been more accurate in her statement of facts.

Mr. BAILEY. I am going to ask the Senator from New York a question and not in a controversial way. Does he not think the Secretary of Labor of the United States, before making a statement like that, might have gotten the facts?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from North Carolina, perhaps, and I, too, have made many speeches in which we have spoken somewhat beyond the card in what we have said from time to time. But I know this woman; I know her great heart. Nobody in the State of New York is more devoted to the cause of the poor, to the cause of social reconstruction, and the upbuilding of our country. She had no thought of reflecting upon the South, I am confident, because, as I have said, she could have said, with more truth, that there is such poverty in the city of New York that our State and our city should be ashamed of the conditions which exist there. It might well be that a factory should be established to make clothing and shoes and stockings exclusively for the underclad children of New York.

Mr. President, it is no reflection on the South that there is poverty; it is no reflection on the North or the East or the West; it is a reflection upon our Nation at large. If we can work out here some way of solving this great social and economic problem, I am sure that those of us who come from the North and the East will join those from the South in helping to find a solution. Nothing can be more important.

I do, however, want to bear testimony to the fact that Miss Perkins has had too long a record of fine social service and is too anxious to aid our country at large, to make any misstatements or to give any wrong impression. I am sure when the time comes for her to speak she will make full explanation which will satisfy my friends from the South.

I just wanted to say that word about this particular member of the President's Cabinet. Mr. Roosevelt selected her because of what she had done in the past in solving such problems as we have been discussing here this morning. I am sure that when you come to know her you will realize that she would be the last one to seek to reflect upon any section of our country. So I say, Mr. President, let us together, from every part of our great Nation, try to solve the problem and to make poverty unknown in America.

RELIEF OF INSURANCE COMPANIES

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. REYNOLDS, Mr. COUZENS, and Mr. KEAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

REGULATION OF BANKING

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1631) to provide for the safe and more effective use of the assets of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations, to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes.

Mr. GLASS. Now, Mr. President, may we have a vote on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan to the banking bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I have a word or two which I wish to say about that amendment. I am not equipped to speak upon the shoe question, and perhaps not as to this amendment of the junior Senator from Michigan to the pending bank bill, but I think it is open to some criticism, at least to some inquiry.

At the last session of Congress a very admirable bill on the banking question was introduced and carried through this body by the distinguished and scholarly Senator from Virginia. Had I been here I should have voted for the bill as it passed. A number of amendments have been offered to that bill during the present session, and I think practically all the amendments tend to impair the original bill rather than to improve it.

The amendment that is now offered I think meets that same description, Mr. President. The bill as it is now framed with the deposit-guaranty provisions in it I think provides for a legal massacre of many hundreds if not thousands of State banks. I am speaking of sound State banks, not of the banks that are unsound. The bill in its present form means that the State banks must either go into the Federal Reserve System or perish. It lays down rules for admission to the Federal Reserve System with which it will be impossible for many sound State banks to comply. While it may not lay down a different rule for the admission of State banks, it does provide a different board of examiners. A State bank must pass the scrutiny of the Federal Reserve Board, while a national bank, in order to take advantage of the guaranty provision, is passed upon by the Comptroller of the Currency who has already passed upon it, for all the banks that are now open have passed the scrutiny of the Comptroller. The Federal Reserve Board before it can admit a State bank to the benefits of the guaranty provision must find that the assets of the bank are unquestionably adequate to meet all its obligations, a degree of proof which today cannot be met by many banks.

The pending amendment—and I want to comment on that briefly—I think rather provides, as many of the State banks must themselves walk the plank, a means of greasing the plank so that they will go off the end of the plank more easily. It provides that State banks may enter a limited bank guaranty fund. In this case it is a Government guaranty; it is not limited to the fund which is provided by the banks, but the bill provides that the Treasury of the United States shall make up the deficiency. It does levy upon the banks, State and National, that go into the fund assessments first of one half of 1 percent, with the possible addition of another one half of 1 percent. Then following for 9 additional years, if there is a shortage in the fund, one fourth of 1 percent each year may be levied upon that bank even though it is no longer a member of the fund. At the end of the year during which this temporary deposit-guaranty fund lasts, any balance remaining in the fund is turned over to the permanent guaranty fund.

A State bank may contribute its half of 1 percent or its 1 percent; the fund may be intact; and if that State bank does not see fit to go into the new and permanent guaranty fund it gets no rebate of the amount it has paid; but its contribution for insurance goes into the general fund for the benefit of those banks that either can go in or choose to go in. It seems to me to be a gross injustice to the bank which does not go in or cannot go in to take its contribution to the fund and assign it to the insurance of other banks. That is the primary objection, Mr. President, that I am making to this amendment.

I think all of the bank guaranty provisions are fundamentally unsound. I think they have been demonstrated to be so in a series of efforts in this country. The distinguished Senator from Virginia has been good-natured and has made concessions to the point of allowing guaranty provisions to be incorporated in what would otherwise have been a sound bill, just as he has conceded that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be a member of the Federal Reserve Board when he says he does not belong there. I think the distinguished Senator from Virginia has allowed his spirit of conciliation and concession to carry him beyond the welfare of the banking interests of this country. I think he should have stood by the bank bill that he worked out with such care and such skill and piloted through the last session of Congress. Therefore, Mr. President, I am going to vote against this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GLASS obtained the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. I have a letter from the cashier of the Basin State Bank, located in Stanford, Mont., reading at follows:

BASIN STATE BANK,
Stanford, Mont., May 19, 1933.

Hon. B. K. WHEELER,

United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WHEELER: According to the press, the new Glass banking bill makes provisions for a guaranty of deposits or insurance of deposits to national banks and members of the Federal Reserve banks, but makes the minimum capital of national banks, as well as State banks that become members, $50,000 in cities of 6,000 or less.

If this bill should become a law with the above provisions, it would in a very short time put all of the small State banks out of business, for no bank could operate, as I see it, against such competition; no bank could make it in the smaller towns with $50,000 capital, for they would not have volume enough to warrant so much money tied up in capital. I feel that the guaranty of deposits or deposit insurance is a good thing, but feel that there should be provisions so that the small banks could get in on it by allowing them to become members of the Federal Reserve, or, better still, to allow them to get in on the deposit guaranty under proper examination, but without having to increase their capital to $50,000.

In this State there are 56 banks capitalized for $50,000 or over and 92 that are capitalized under $50,000, mostly $20,000 and $25,000.

I hope that you will use your efforts to save the small country banks that are worthy.

Yours very truly,

N. B. MATTHEWS, Cashier.

As I understand the Senator from Virginia, he feels that the bill would not shut out banks that are organized for less than $50,000 in towns of 6,000 or less population from becoming members of the Federal Reserve System at the present time, or, rather, after the passage of the bill.

Mr. GLASS. No; not after the passage of the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me call the Senator's attention to a paragraph which I think should be amended if that is the way the Senator feels about it. I refer to paragraph (b), on page 59, reading as follows:

(b) The tenth paragraph of section 9 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"No applying bank shall be admitted to membership in the Federal Reserve bank unless it possesses a paid-up unimpaired capital sufficient to entitle it to become a national banking association in the place where it is situated under the provisions of the National Bank Act, as amended."

It seems to me quite clear that that language shuts out any bank that is now organized with a capital of $25,000 from becoming a member of the Federal Reserve bank.

Mr. GLASS. No; not of $25,000; but of $20,000, yes.

Mr. WHEELER. And of $25,000.

Mr. GLASS. No; I do not think so.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator will follow the reading of the language that is in the bill at the present time, I believe he will agree with me. The language is:

No applying bank shall be admitted to membership in a Federal Reserve bank unless it possesses a paid-up unimpaired capital sufficient to entitle it to become a national banking association in the place where it is situated under the provisions of the National Bank Act, as amended.

Mr. GLASS. "In the place where it is situated." That is to say, in a small town where, for example, a national bank has the minimum capital of $25,000, a State bank in that same place, in order to gain membership in the Federal Reserve System, would have to have a capital of only $25,000. If the Senator will refer to the Federal Reserve Act itself, governing the application of State banks for membership in the Federal Reserve System, he will see that they are required to have only that capitalization which is provided for national banks in towns of the same population.

Mr. WHEELER. I am simply asking the Senator for information, because I am not as familiar with it as he is, but it seems to me when we amend the prior section so as to read:

After this section, as amended, takes effect, no national banking association shall be organized with a less capital than $100,000, except that such associations with a capital of not less than $50,000 may be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed 6,000 inhabitants—

Then—

Mr. GLASS. That applies, if I may interrupt the Senator, to banks organized after the enactment of this bill into law and not to any existing banks.

Mr. WHEELER. But the point is that the next provision is that "no applying bank shall be admitted to membership in a Federal Reserve bank unless it possesses a paid-up unimpaired capital sufficient to entitle it to become a national banking association"; in other words, it seems to me that this section, taken in connection with the other, will require the small bank, in the town of less than 6,000 population, to increase its capital stock from $25,000 to $50,000 before it may become a member of the Federal Reserve bank.

Mr. GLASS. The purpose of the committee in preparing the bill was to put an applying State bank on exactly the same basis as the national bank, which is compelled to become a member, and if there be any doubt about it we shall be very glad to clarify the matter so as to meet the point the Senator is making.

Mr. WHEELER. That is the thought I had in mind, that that language should be clarified.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, there is another proposed amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] which I ask may be stated at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 69, line 12, insert the following:

Provided, That in States with a population of less than one half million, and which have no cities located therein with a population exceeding 50,000, the capital shall not be less than $100,000.

Mr. GLASS. The committee accepts the amendment and hopes that it may be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, there has been considerable argument as to how long a time should be permitted commercial banks engaged in the investment business to get out of that business, and banks operating affiliates conducting an investment business to separate themselves from those affiliates. The committee reported the bill granting a period of 2 years for such separation. There is no evidence to indicate that 2 years will be necessary to accomplish the separation. I accordingly offer amendments which will take effect in several places in the bill, if adopted, to reduce the period of separation from 2 years to 1 year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio proposes certain amendments, which the clerk will report.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 58, line 7, strike out the words "two years" and insert "one year"; the same amendment on page 10, line 14; the same amendment on page 59, line 11; the same amendment on page 66, line 8; and the same amendment on page 67, line 8.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments are agreed to. Without objection, committee amendments will now be considered, and the clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The committee proposes, on page 6, line 10, after the word "stock", to insert the following:

(and any other banking institution the capital of which consists of weekly or other time deposits which are segregated from all other deposits and are regarded as capital stock for the purposes of taxation and the declaration of dividends),

So as to read:

(c) Section 9 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"Any mutual savings bank having no capital stock (and any other banking institution the capital of which consists of weekly or other time deposits which are segregated from all other deposits and are regarded as capital stock for the purposes of taxation and the declaration of dividends), but having surplus and undivided profits not less than the amount of capital required for the organization of a national bank in the same place, may apply for and be admitted to membership in the Federal Reserve System in the same manner and subject to the same provisions of law as State banks and trust companies, except that such savings bank shall subscribe for capital stock of the Federal Reserve bank in an amount equal to six tenths of 1 percent of its total deposit liabilities as shown by the most recent report of examination of such savings bank preceding its admission to membership."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 17, after the word "bank", to insert "or a corporation existing on the date this paragraph takes effect engaged solely in holding the bank premises of such State member bank", so as to read:

After 2 years from the date of the enactment of the Banking Act of 1933, no certificate representing the stock of any State member bank shall represent the stock of any other corporation, except a member bank or a corporation existing on the date this paragraph takes effect engaged solely in holding the bank premises of such State member bank, nor shall the ownership, sale, or transfer of any certificate representing the stock of any such bank be conditioned in any manner whatsoever upon the ownership, sale, or transfer of a certificate representing the stock of any other corporation, except a member bank.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 46, after line 17, to insert the following subparagraph:

(b) The paragraph of section 13 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, beginning "That in addition to the powers now vested in national banking associations" is amended (effective 6 months hence) to read as follows:

"Any national banking association located and doing business in any place the population of which does not exceed 5,000 inhabitants, as shown by the last preceding decennial census, may, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency, act as the broker or agent for others in making or procuring loans on real estate located within 100 miles of the place in which such association is located, receiving for such services a reasonable fee or commission; but no such association shall in any case guarantee either the principal or interest of any such loan."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 14, after the word "bank", to insert "or a corporation existing on the date this paragraph takes effect engaged solely in holding the bank premises of such association", so as to read:

SEC. 18. Section 5139 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"After 2 years from the date of the enactment of the Banking Act of 1933, no certificate representing the stock of any such association shall represent the stock of any other corporation, except a member bank or a corporation existing on the date this paragraph takes effect engaged solely in holding the bank premises of such association, nor shall the ownership, sale, or transfer of any certificate representing the stock of any such association be conditioned in any manner whatsoever upon the ownership, sale, or transfer of a certificate representing the stock of any other corporation, except a member bank."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, to strike out lines 24 and 25, and on page 60 to strike out in lines 1 and 2 as follows:

In all elections of directors and in deciding all questions at meetings of shareholders, each shareholder shall be entitled to one vote on each share of stock held by him.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

In all elections of directors, each shareholder shall have the right to vote the number of shares owned by him for as many persons as there are directors to be elected, or to cumulate such shares and give one candidate as many votes as the number of directors multiplied by the number of his shares shall equal, or to distribute them on the same principle among as many candidates as he shall think fit; and in deciding all other questions at meetings of shareholders, each shareholder shall be entitled to one vote on each share of stock held by him.

So as to read:

In all elections of directors, each shareholder shall have the right to vote the number of shares owned by him for as many persons as there are directors to be elected, or to cumulate such shares and give one candidate as many votes as the number of directors multiplied by the number of his shares shall equal, or to distribute them on the same principle among as many candidates as he shall think fit; and in deciding all other questions at meetings of shareholders, each shareholder shall be entitled to one vote on each share of stock held by him; except (1) that shares of its own stock held by a national bank as sole trustee shall not be voted, and shares of its own stock held by a national bank and one or more persons as trustees may be voted by such other person or persons, as trustees, in the same manner as if he or they were the sole trustee, and (2) shares controlled by any holding-company affiliate of a national bank shall not be voted unless such holding-company affiliate shall have first obtained a voting permit as hereinafter provided, which permit is in force at the time such shares are voted. Shareholders may vote by proxies duly authorized in writing; but no officer, clerk, teller, or bookkeeper of such bank shall act as proxy; and no shareholder whose liability is past due and unpaid shall be allowed to vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, after line 14, to insert the following new section:

SEC. 33. Nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit a national banking association from holding stock in a corporation organized by such association to liquidate a part of its assets pursuant to the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, line 20, to strike out the numerals "33" and insert the numerals "34", renumbering the section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. That concludes the committee amendments.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a minor technical amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Ohio proposes, on page 48, line 25, to strike out the word "unconditionally" so as to read:

No member bank shall, directly or indirectly by any device whatsoever, pay any interest on any deposit which is payable on demand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BULKLEY. I offer another amendment for the purpose of clarification.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 29, line 9, strike out the words "the amount by which", and in line 10 strike out the words "does not exceed" and insert in lieu thereof "not exceeding", so as to make the sentence read:

One hundred percent of such net amount not exceeding $10,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer an amendment at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 49, line 1, after the word "prohibiting", strike out all the remainder of the proviso and insert in lieu thereof the following:

money from being deposited as Postal Savings or from drawing interest as now provided by law or in any manner repealing or modifying the present law governing the receipt by the Government of Postal Savings and their management and control.

So as to read:

No member bank shall, directly or indirectly by any device whatsoever, pay any interest on any deposit which is payable unconditionally on demand: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as prohibiting money from being deposited as Postal Savings or from drawing interest as now provided by law or in any manner repealing or modifying the present law governing the receipt by the Government of Postal Savings and their management and control.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this subsection and subsection (c) on the same page provide virtually for the destruction of the Postal Savings System. That System has been in effect many years and has been a wonderful work. I know there are cities in Tennessee and I think all over the country where the Postal Savings bank has been largely the one bank that has remained open. I know of at least two places in my State where for quite a while had it not been for the Postal Savings there would have been no money in those two cities.

The provision contained in the bill has been reported from the Banking and Currency Committee without any consultation with the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and without any consultation with the Post Office Department, without asking whether it was favored by that Department or not. The purpose of the amendment which I have just tendered, and one which I shall offer when this is disposed of, is to correct that situation.

In this connection, I want to read to the Senate, and I hope they will listen to it—it is not long—a letter from the Post Office Department which discusses this proposal.

It is a letter addressed to me by the Third Assistant Postmaster General:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
DIVISION OF POSTAL SAVINGS,
May 23, 1933.

HON. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: The so-called "Glass bill" (S. 1631), has been read with a great deal of satisfaction. However, paragraphs (b) and (c) of section 11, affecting Postal Savings, give me so much concern that I feel constrained to call your attention to the far-reaching effects of the section referred to from the Postal Savings standpoint.

Postal Savings deposits are evidenced by Postal Savings certificates of deposit in denominations of $1, $2, $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $200, and $500, samples attached hereto.

For the benefit of those who are interested in the RECORD, I desire to have printed in the RECORD at this point the samples which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The samples are as follows:

Mr. McKELLAR. I continue reading from the letter:

These certificates are payable on demand and bear interest at the rate of 2 percent per annum from the first day of the month next succeeding the date of deposit. However, the regulations have been amended to permit quarterly payment of interest when a certificate is surrendered for the full amount of the principal.

Postal Savings funds received at depository post offices are, in accordance with the act, deposited in local qualified banks substantially in proportion to the capital and surplus of the banks willing to qualify under the terms of the act. Funds deposited in qualified banks bear interest at the rate of 2½ percent per annum, which is debited on the banks' reports as of January 1 and July 1 of each year. The deposits in banks, together with investments in Government bonds, yielded a gross profit to the Government for the fiscal year 1932 of $4,255,326.65, from which were paid the operating expenses of the System, leaving a net profit of $1,023,901.77.

Section 8 of the organic Postal Savings Act, approved June 25, 1910, specifically states: "That any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, with the accrued interest, upon demand * * *." The Glass bill provides that "No deposit shall be made with any Postal Savings depository for a period of less than 60 days, and no depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, or the accrued interest thereon, at any time prior to the expiration of 60 days after the funds sought to be withdrawn were deposited. Any funds not withdrawn at the expiration of the period for which they were deposited shall be deemed to be redeposited for a period of 60 days; and all funds deposited with any Postal Savings depository on the date this section, as amended, takes effect, shall be deemed to be deposited on such date for a period of 60 days. All withdrawals shall be made under such regulations, not inconsistent with this act, as the Postmaster General may prescribe."

Our present system of evidencing deposits by certificates, rather than by passbooks, is not adaptable to such restrictions. A deposit of $2,500, the maximum amount permitted to the credit of an individual depositor, might easily be evidenced by dozens of certificates, embracing denominations of $1, $2, $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $200, and $500, all having different interest dates. In other words, not the entire deposit of a depositor would be subject to the 60-day limitation as a lump, but the minutiae of which it is composed. The restriction on withdrawals would be an endless embarrassment to 2,235,000 depositors; would greatly increase field expenditure and departmental overhead; and, consequently, run counter to the economic program of the administration.

The bill's annoying, artificial restrictions on withdrawals provide that on the day the bill becomes effective all deposits shall be deemed to have been deposited for a period of 60 days; that is, approximately $1,200,000,000 will be automatically tied up for 2 months—the small savings of 2,255,000 citizens placed beyond their reach for that period. These people hold evidence of their deposits in the form of Postal Savings certificates on each of which is engraved the assurance that the faith of the United States of America is solemnly pledged to repayment on demand. Many of these people, with ample justification, no longer had confidence in established banking institutions. They turned to the facilities their Government offered. In normal times the Postal Savings System offers little attraction other than safety and the assurance of prompt repayment. For more than 20 years the 2-percent interest rate has been admittedly noncompetitive. If Congress demands that the pledge of repayment on demand be ignored and hedges the System about with hindrances whose only apparent function is to lessen the System's usefulness, the inescapable result will be that when, 60 days after the bill becomes effective, deposits are again accessible to the owners there will be an immediate demand to withdraw. There is a question whether local banks will be able to pay over their Postal Savings holdings and meet these demands. There is also the question whether any part of the funds withdrawn will be deposited in banks or whether all will go into hiding.

Section 9 of the Postal Savings Act, as amended May 18, 1916, provides "that Postal Savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in solvent banks, whether organized under National or State laws, and whether member banks or not of the Federal Reserve System established by the act approved December 23, 1913, being subject to National or State supervision and examination, and the sums deposited shall bear interest at the rate of not less than 2½ percent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the United States and Territories thereof; but 5 percent of such funds shall be withdrawn by the board of trustees and kept with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be treasurer of the board of trustees, in lawful money as a reserve * * *. Such funds may be withdrawn from the treasurer of said board of trustees, and all other Postal Savings funds, or any part of such funds, may be at any time withdrawn from the banks and savings depository offices for the repayment of Postal Savings depositors when required for that purpose * * *. When, in the judgment of the President, the general welfare and interests of the United States so require, the board of trustees may invest all or part of the Postal Savings funds, except the reserve fund of 5 percent herein provided for, in bonds or other securities of the United States * * *."

The Glass bill provides that, "No member bank shall, directly or indirectly by any device whatsoever, pay any interest on any deposit which is payable unconditionally on demand * * *. Postal Savings deposits in banks, although considered by the Federal Reserve System as time deposits in computing reserves for member banks, are essentially demand deposits. To insure an operating revenue, the Postal Savings System being a self-supporting institution, it would be necessary to withdraw all Postal Savings deposits now in member banks and to deposit such funds in nonmember banks or invest them in Government bonds—a feature not in harmony with the apparent intent of the proposed legislation.

I call especial attention to the last three paragraphs, which set forth the position just exactly as it is:

The Postal Savings System acts as a magnet for secreted money putting the funds drawn from every known way of ingenious hiding to work for the benefit of 2,255,000 depositors, of 5,470 banks qualified to receive the funds of the System, and of national finance. The beneficiaries named all have their interests conserved by a system of checks and balances prescribed by existing Postal Savings law. To disturb this balance—give to any beneficiary special preferment—would be lamentably unfortunate. Every extreme proposal, when analyzed, whether that of making the Government enter the field of pure banking, or on the contrary, that of fettering the Postal Savings System, means a greatly increased governmental personnel and, hence, a financial outlay wholly inconsistent and inharmonious with the economy program of the administration.

To lay the ills of the banking world at the doors of the Postal Savings System is unwarranted. Had it not been for the Postal Savings System this country would have been honeycombed with hidden money. It is fundamental, absolutely so, that the Government must not compete with established banking institutions. It should be equally fundamental that banks should not insist on restrictions at variance with the true purpose of the Service. Extremes, in other words, must be avoided that the fullest cooperation may follow. It is believed that the proposed legislation is a revolutionary departure from the basic principle of postal savings in this country.

Legislation affecting the Postal Savings System should be formulated in a special bill giving spokesmen for the System, not merely spokesmen for organized opposition, opportunity to be heard prior to its passage.

Very truly yours,

CLINTON B. EILENEERGER,
Third Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. President, I want to endorse that letter. Here is the Postal System, which has grown up through many years of experience. It has worked splendidly. The people have confidence in it. There is no one who does not have confidence in the Postal Savings banks. The small depositor knows that he can put his money there and that he can get it out.

To illustrate, a short time ago in one of the cities of my State all the banks failed and the Postal Savings accounts, of course, were tremendously increased. The System afforded practically the only money that they had. It ought not to be destroyed in this way. The Post Office Committee never has had the matter brought to its attention at all. There may be reasons for the destruction of the System; there may be reasons why we should do away with it; but they have not been presented. This bill absolutely destroys, or will destroy, the Postal Savings System, and I do not think it ought to be done, and I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment I have offered to prevent its destruction.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the committee has had no purpose to destroy the Postal Savings System. The Postal Savings System gives depositors the benefit of the Government responsibility for their deposits. At the same time it permits them to have deposits withdrawn upon demand, and to receive interest upon those deposits.

It is true that the rate of interest paid has been low enough so that the System has been substantially noncompetitive. The bill which is now being considered prohibits commercial banks' paying any interest whatever on demand deposits. That being so, any interest paid on demand deposits by the Postal Savings System would be an unduly competitive rate. The committee has sought to remedy this by prohibiting the Postal Savings System from having any deposits withdrawable on demand.

The Senator from Tennessee has read a letter from the Third Assistant Postmaster General, which has come to him just this morning, suggesting some technical criticisms as to the method which the committee has proposed in the pending bill. I am impressed with the merit of some of the criticisms. There is not time here to consider and work out an amendment to the paragraph that is in the bill. I think I can safely assure the Senator from Tennessee that the matter can be given proper attention in conference, so that the technical difficulties can be adequately and satisfactorily met.

The amendment that is proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, however, not only perpetuates the injustice of Government competition with banks, but accentuates it. He would give the depositors in the Postal Savings System not only a Government guaranty of their deposits but the right to draw interest on demand deposits, which commercial banks are by this bill prohibited from paying.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, just one word before we vote on the matter. I want to show the Senate what the provision recommended by the committee does to the Postal Savings System. It does not do anything but take a rapier and plunge it into the System and draw it around and absolutely disembowel the whole System. That is all it does to it. It is just like cutting the throat of an animal. If you cut the throat of a cat with a knife, you do not hurt the cat, except to cut its throat is to destroy it. That is all you do.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator do me the kindness to call attention to the particular provision to which he adverts?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. Turn to the bottom of page 48, line 23. I shall be very happy to explain just exactly what it means.

No member bank shall, directly or indirectly, by any device whatsoever, pay any interest on any deposit which is payable unconditionally on demand:

Of that I have no complaint; but here is a proviso about which I have very great complaint, and this is the crux of the situation:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as prohibiting the payment of interest in accordance with the terms of any certificate of deposit or other contract heretofore entered into in good faith which is in force on the date of the enactment of this paragraph; but no such certificate of deposit or other contract shall be renewed or extended unless it shall be modified to conform to this paragraph, and every member bank shall take such action as may be necessary to conform to this paragraph as soon as possible consistently with its contractual obligations.

That means that many millions of obligations are out, such as those that I put in the Record a moment ago. The Government issues a certificate to a man who comes and deposits with the Post Office Department $50 or $100 or $500. That is the limit of the deposit; but the Government issues an agreement. All this provision means is that it would not apply to those agreements that are already out; but that when those are taken in, there shall be no more agreements like them.

Now I call the Senator's attention to line 22, on page 49, at the bottom of the page. That also refers to this matter:

(c) Section 8 of the act entitled "An act to establish Postal Savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes", approved June 25, 1910, as amended—

I stop here long enough to say that this bill is from the Banking and Currency Committee. The Postal Savings System had its beginning in the Post Office Committee, and it seems to me the Post Office Committee ought at least to have been advised with before assuming authority to repeal these laws. But I read on, to give what the proposed change is—is amended by striking out the first sentence thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Now, get the language:

No deposit shall be made with any Postal Savings depository for a period of less than 60 days, and no depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, or the accrued interest thereon, at any time prior to the expiration of 60 days after the funds sought to be withdrawn were deposited. Any funds not withdrawn at the expiration of the period for which they were deposited shall be deemed to be redeposited for a period of 60 days; and all funds deposited with any Postal Savings depository on the date this section, as amended, takes effect, shall be deemed to be deposited on such date for a period of 60 days. All withdrawals shall be made under such regulations, not inconsistent with this act, as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

That means that the Postal Savings bank, as we understand it now, is no more. We cannot pay interest on postal deposits. As it is now, the Government makes money by the transactions. It pays 2 percent on postal deposits; it receives from the depository banks $2\frac{1}{2}$ percent. The gross profit is about \$4,500,000 annually, and the net profit is more than a million dollars, after paying all expenses. It is a source of profit to the Government—one of the few things in the Post Office Department where the Government is making a profit.

As we all know, the Post Office Department itself is away behind. This is one function of the Department that is making money. Why should we repeal the act at such a time as this, when it is absolutely necessary for poor people, people of small means, people who have not learned how to avoid income taxes—if I may use the illustration—and who can put their money with the Government in the Postal Savings bank, and draw it out when they desire, and receive a small interest rate on it, knowing that their money will always be there?

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I do not know whether I understand this provision correctly. I desire, therefore, to direct a question to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator at the very outset that it is so marvelously drawn that I do not think anybody knows absolutely what it means. But it does mean this, it means a proposed destruction, the first great step in the destruction of the Postal Savings System. That is what it means.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the first sentence in the provision is:

No deposit shall be made with any Postal Savings depository for a period of less than 60 days, and no depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, or the accrued interest thereon, at any time prior to the expiration of 60 days after the funds sought to be withdrawn were deposited.

The next sentence provides that—

Any funds not withdrawn at the expiration of the period for which they were deposited shall be deemed to be redeposited for a period of 60 days.

Does the Senator understand that under that provision a deposit must be drawn on the sixtieth day, or else it is automatically redeposited for another period of 60 days, during which period it cannot be withdrawn, so that the only right the depositor has is to withdraw the funds on the sixtieth day?

Mr. McKELLAR. If language means anything, the Senator is exactly correct about it. That is what I understand from it.

Mr. BRATTON. If it is redeposited, it is for another period of 60 days, during which the depositor cannot withdraw it.

Mr. McKELLAR. And cannot get interest.

Mr. BRATTON. So that once every 60 days—that is to say, on the sixtieth day—the depositor has the right to withdraw that money, but not between times.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand the language, that is what it means.

Mr. BRATTON. And it operates automatically.

Mr. McKELLAR. And, of course, no person would deposit his funds under any such condition.

Mr. BRATTON. Do those in charge of the measure understand it to operate in that manner?

Mr. BULKLEY. That is correct, with the exception of the misinterpretation of the Senator from Tennessee with respect to the prohibition of the payment of interest. It does not prohibit the payment of interest or change it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The preceding provision rejects interest, of course.

Mr. BULKLEY. No; there is nothing about interest in it at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BRATTON. Is it the intention of those in charge of the bill to require a depositor to be at the post office exactly on the sixtieth day, else his deposit is automatically redeposited for another period of 60 days, during which it cannot be withdrawn?

Mr. BULKLEY. I will say frankly to the Senator that the purpose of the authors of the bill was to prevent the acceptance of demand deposits by the postal depositories. If the Senator feels that that has not been effectively accomplished, or if it could be accomplished in a way that would be more convenient to the depositor, the committee would have no objection to listening to the Senator's suggestion, but we cannot prohibit commercial banks from paying interest on demand deposits, and, at the same time, permit the Postal Savings bank to continue to pay such interest.

Mr. BRATTON. It seems to me that it is a cumbersome and onerous system to provide that the money shall be automatically redeposited on the sixtieth day for another period of 60 days. If the depositor is not there at the window on the sixtieth day, if he is ill, if he is out of town, if he is incapacitated and cannot withdraw his money on that day, his money is redeposited for another 60-day period. That is onerous.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I think there is much force in what the Senator says, and I am sure the committee would not oppose an amendment making it easier for the depositors.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator said that nothing was said about a prohibition of interest. Listen to this language. I do not know what it means—

Mr. BULKLEY. I accept the Senator's statement that he does not know what it means.

Mr. McKELLAR. And I do not believe the author knew what it meant when the language was put in here, because he has already stated—

Mr. GLASS. The Senator should confine his criticism to himself, and not direct it to those who prepared the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not the author of the bill. I read from the bill:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed as prohibiting the payment of interest in accordance with the terms of any certificate of deposit or other contract heretofore entered into in good faith which is in force on the date of the enactment of this paragraph.

Nothing there would prevent the payment of interest on contracts heretofore made; that is, deposits heretofore made in the Government post offices.

Mr. GLASS. Is not that simple enough?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one minute.

Mr. GLASS. Is not that simple enough?

Mr. McKELLAR. That applies to those already made.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; it does.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is what it says about those to be made hereafter:

But no such certificate of deposit or other contract shall be renewed or extended unless it shall be modified to conform to this paragraph, and every member bank shall take such action as may be necessary to conform to this paragraph as soon as possible, consistently with its contractual obligations.

What does that mean?

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator will just give us an opportunity to tell the Senate what it means, there will not be any trouble in the world in telling him what it means.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate dealt with this question of the payment of interest on demand deposits, because it ascertained, upon inquiry, that it had gotten to be a dangerous vice in the banking system of this country, and we did not find it necessary to confer with the Senator from Tennessee or with the Post Office Department to enlighten us on that problem. In other words, the payment of interest on demand deposits, a system viciously and partially administered, particularly in the great money centers of the country, had resulted in withdrawing from the interior country banks of the United States millions upon millions of dollars to the money centers, to be cast into the maelstrom of stock gambling, and we wanted to put a stop to that.

Mr. President, it was ascertained that over a period of 6 years last past the average interest paid on demand deposits by the banks of the Federal Reserve System alone aggregated $230,000,000, and in 1929 that interest amounted to $259,000,000. So that it was a magnet for all the surplus funds of every country bank in the United States, to draw these funds to the money centers for speculative purposes.

Moreover, it is a system that is subject to maladministration. As I have already stated to the Senate, the average banker, particularly the average country banker, meaning those bankers outside of the central reserve and reserve cities, has what he calls his standard rate of interest, and he utterly disregards the law of supply and demand. If he has an abundance of currency and credit on his books, which would enable him to be generous, certainly liberal and fair, to the tradesmen, the business men, the industries of his own community, he never departs from his standard rate of interest, he never lends them at a lower rediscount rate, but he would rather take his money, his surplus funds, and bundle them off to New York or Chicago, to be loaned on demand, even at a nominal rate, formerly 2 percent, now one and a half percent, than to grant a single, solitary concession to the business men of his own community, or to the industries of his own community, in order to stimulate and expand the business of that community, his very foolish contention being that, once departing from his standard rate of interest, which is always the limit of the law, he could not return to it. But, of course, he could return to it, under the very same logic that induced him to depart from it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I feel in sympathy with the proposition of preventing the banks from paying interest on demand deposits, but I am wondering whether, under the pending bill, they would not be able to evade the law by lending it on a very short time, making a time deposit of it, maybe of 2 days, renewing it from time to time.

Mr. GLASS. A 2-day deposit is not a time deposit. There is a well-defined meaning, in banking processes, of "time deposit", as distinguished from "demand deposit."

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; but is there any well-defined meaning as to the exact limit?

Mr. GLASS. Only by practice.

Mr. NORRIS. Would it not be well to define that in the law?

Mr. GLASS. I do not think we well could. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that if he will examine his bank certificates, judging Nebraska by Virginia, he will find printed on the face of them a statement that, "This deposit will bear 3-percent interest if left with the bank for a period of 4 months, or 4 percent interest if left a longer period." That is the practice.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator, if he will permit, in connection with the illustration he has just used, this question: Suppose that certificate which says on its face that one would be entitled to 3-percent interest if it were left 4 months, and 4-percent interest if left 6 months, is left 2 months. What would the construction be?

Mr. GLASS. Interest could not be demanded in 2 months.

Mr. NORRIS. The certificate says that it will draw 3 percent if left 4 months, but it does not follow that the depositor would have to leave it 4 months, does it?

Mr. GLASS. Under the laws of the various States, a time deposit is a time deposit, and the banker is entitled to a given number of months for notice.

Mr. NORRIS. But the certificate does not state any specific time.

Mr. GLASS. The law of the State does.

Mr. NORRIS. The depositor would not get interest, then?

Mr. GLASS. No.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be up to the depositor to say whether he would leave it for 2 months, or 3 months, or 6 months.

Mr. GLASS. If he should withdraw it in less than 3 months, he would not get interest at all. We undertook, for various reasons, some of which I have already enumerated, to put a stop to this vice of withdrawing the money of country banks for speculative purposes and uses in the money centers. If we were to permit interest on demand deposits in the Postal Savings System, that would be unfair to the commercial banks to which we are denying the right to pay interest on demand deposits. It would divert thousands of dollars of deposits from commercial banks to the Postal Savings banks.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question about that. I have always felt that I was a friend of the Postal Savings Bank System; I feel that way yet; but I do not see any fair reason for objecting to the same kind of a time limit being applied to Postal Savings banks that is to be applied to the commercial banks.

Mr. GLASS. That is precisely what we propose to do in this bill; in other words, the Postal Savings bank is not permitted to receive a demand deposit. If money be deposited there it has to stay there for 60 days if it is going to draw any interest.

Mr. NORRIS. It could be deposited there and taken out the next day, could it not, except that it would not draw any interest?

Mr. GLASS. No; it could not be so deposited, because that would be a demand deposit.

Mr. NORRIS. As I see it, then, the Senator is proposing to apply a different rule to the Postal Savings bank to that which he proposes to apply to commercial banks?

Mr. GLASS. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Take the Senator's own illustration. A certificate of deposit provides that a certain sum of money, if it remains in the bank for 3 months, will draw 2 percent interest.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; but if it does not remain there that long, it will not draw any interest.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. Then it is really a demand deposit, is it not? The depositor can say whether it shall be a time deposit or a demand deposit.

Mr. GLASS. No; under the laws of the various States the depositors must give, in some instances, 60 days' notice and in others they must give 90 days' notice before they can withdraw a deposit at all.

Mr. NORRIS. If under the same kind of certificate—I would not quarrel with anyone as to what its form should be—in the case of the Postal Savings System it could be provided, as in the case of the commercial-bank certificate, that the deposit shall draw 2 percent interest if left for 60 days, and stop at that, as is done in the other case, I would have no objection. It seems to me that would be fair.

Mr. GLASS. We do not deal with certificates in the pending bill. It does not make any difference whether there is a certificate or not.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. GLASS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. I just wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that while the banks may voluntarily permit withdrawals of deposits before the prescribed time limit, under the laws of all the States, they are not susceptible of being withdrawn until the time limit expires.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us take this illustration. A certificate is issued which provides that if the money is left for 3 months it will draw 2 percent interest. Suppose the holder of that certificate goes in at the end of 2 months, is he not entitled to withdraw his deposit?

Mr. LONG. No, sir; he is not entitled to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the certificate on its face is a falsehood.

Mr. LONG. I want to explain that he is not entitled to his money until the time limit runs out. It is true that a number of banks have allowed depositors to withdraw money when they desire to do so by waiving all interest up to date. That, however, was a privilege that the bank might have allowed or not allowed.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it in the certificate?

Mr. LONG. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Take such a certificate as that to which the Senator from Virginia has referred. Take one with that wording—

Mr. GLASS. It is in the nature of a contract.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. LONG. It is a contract.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not interfere with it being a contract if the depositor is left the right to get his money at any time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield further to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The point is if we allow the Postal Savings banks to permit withdrawals at any time we will be giving those banks a distinct preference over the banks that are in commercial business, because they enter into a contract that if a man puts his money in the bank for 60 days or for 90 days he may draw 2-percent interest on it. If he goes to the bank and the bank wants to break that contract it can do so; it can absolve itself from that or any other contract, but, unless the two parties do agree to break the contract, the depositor cannot withdraw his money until the time runs out.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit another interruption there, the Senator having stated the case that the Senator from Virginia stated, if one makes a contract and gets a certificate that says that the money deposited is to stay in the bank for 3 months and draw 2-percent interest, that is a contract; it cannot be drawn out before that time; but that is not the certificate I have been talking about and that is not the certificate the Senator from Virginia gave as an illustration. The certificate to which he referred says on its face, "If you leave this money here 3 months, you will get 2-percent interest on it." It follows, as a natural consequence, that the depositor does not have to leave it there 3 months.

Mr. GLASS. The law of the State of Virginia provides distinctly that the depositor must give 90 days' notice before he may withdraw.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all right.

Mr. GLASS. That is all there is to it.

Mr. NORRIS. There can be a State law, I concede, that can provide that the depositor cannot draw money out by a check without giving notice; that would be legal; but here is the case of the construction of a contract, and the contract says, "If you leave this money here for 60 days, you will get so much interest, and if you do not leave it here that long, you do not get any"; but one can get the money any time he wants to under that kind of a contract.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if I may proceed now, just for a few minutes more, I have undertaken to explain to the Senate, particularly for the information of the Senator from Tennessee, just why the Banking and Currency Committee felt that it had jurisdiction of the subject of the payment of interest on demand deposits of banks whether they were commercial banks or whether they were Postal Savings banks.

I think it is a conservative estimate to say that two thirds of the letters received by the Banking and Currency Committee about the provisions of this bank bill were in protest against paying any interest at all by Postal Savings banks.

The assertion has been made over and over again, and I think with full justification, that the Postal Savings Bank System, under the guise of being a Government system, and under the guise of receiving interest from the Government of the United States, has largely undermined the commercial and the savings-bank systems of this country. The Government does not pay a tithe of this interest; the statement that it does is a fraud and a pretense. It receives these deposits; it deposits them in commercial banks, I think exclusively in national banks, and the deposits thus made by the Government in the national banks are embraced in the funds sent forward for stock speculative purposes at the money centers.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, may I remind the Senator also that when the Post Office Department deposits these funds with the banks they require security, to the detriment of other depositors of those banks?

Mr. GLASS. Exactly; so that, in the view of most people who have criticized the bill, we ought to have prohibited altogether the payment of interest by Postal Savings banks. My distinguished colleague from Ohio, who was charged especially with drafting that feature of the bill, undertook to avoid that absolute prohibition by providing that there should be no demand deposits in the Postal Savings banks. To indicate that other members of the Senate have received the same sort of protests as the Banking and Currency Committee has received, I may state that, of the seven amendments proposed to this bill which are printed and on my desk, four of them are to prohibit the payment of any interest by Postal Savings banks.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. GLASS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is speaking of protests received. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that the protests which have come to the Senator—and they have come to me also—against the payment of any interest by the Postal Savings System do not come entirely from bankers who have a direct interest in the result of this proposed legislation?

Mr. GLASS. They do not.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, mine do.

Mr. GLASS. And of the 4 or 5 provisions offered here by Senators prohibiting the payment of interest on postal savings, I think I may actually say that not one of these Senators is a banker or was ever in the banking business.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Do I understand that the effect of this amendment will be that men and women can no longer put money in the Postal Savings banks as they now do and get certificates and draw the money out at any time under 60 days? Is that the effect of it?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. DILL. Then it is proposed to put everybody in the position of not being able to draw out the money in less than that period?

Mr. GLASS. Just as if the Senator were to put his money in a savings bank in the State of Virginia, he could not draw it out without notice for 90 days.

Mr. DILL. I have here, for instance, a small certificate which entitles me to draw out money any time I want to draw it out. That puts me to the trouble of going to a Postal Savings bank to get any of the money. Now, it is proposed by this amendment to make it impossible to get the money out except on 60 days' notice. Is that correct?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. DILL. I have an amendment to make it possible to check on these accounts, so that the depositor will not even have to go to the bank to get his money. That is how far apart I stand from the Senator from Virginia's position.

Mr. GLASS. That is pretty far apart.

Mr. DILL. It certainly is.

Mr. GLASS. It is a question for the Senate to determine if the Government is going into the checking business. That is a different proposition; but I do not think the Government ought to go into the bank checking business.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I want to say to the Senator from Nebraska, more than to the Senator from Virginia, that there is not any difference in the laws of the States, I think, with regard to time limit on withdrawals of deposits; it is a universal law. I think the same law will be found to exist in Nebraska. Time deposits in any of the States, I do not care how the certificate may read, cannot be withdrawn, unless the bank consents to it, except upon notice of 60 days or 90 days, as the case may be. That is the universal law.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, banks do not put that in operation.

Mr. LONG. Oh, yes; they do.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg to differ with the Senator, because I have deposited some money in that way myself, and I have been able to draw it out and the banks are willing to do it.

Mr. LONG. Unless they give you notice that they are not willing.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; but in ordinary circumstances they let the depositor draw it out.

Mr. LONG. That may be true, but the facts are, none the less, that if the bank wishes to break the contract, all well and good; but if the bank does not wish to waive the contract which the depositor has entered into, he must wait until the time expires in order to withdraw his money, and if we should today allow them to put the money in the Postal Savings bank with the right to withdraw it at any time, the Government would be granting the depositor something that cannot be done under the laws of the States.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana if he thinks the Government should not provide a safe place in which the citizen may put his money? Out in my State the privately controlled banks have given no evidence of great stability and safety, and the one great safe banking institution in the State of Washington is the Postal Savings Bank System.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will let me answer the question, I wish to say to the Senator from Washington that the reason I am now favoring this bill so much as I am is because there has been written into it a section which will actually provide safe banks in Washington, such as heretofore it has not had.

Mr. BONE. I can see no reason why, in this type of legislation, we should proceed on the theory that we should destroy the Postal Savings banks, and by a process of attrition largely whittle away those features that have made them highly attractive to the great mass of people. I had hoped to support this bill, but if we are going to destroy the Postal Savings banks or render them of less service than they have been giving the people, I do not know that I can vote for this measure; and I think the Democratic Party will place itself in a very peculiar position if it sets about now to hamper or destroy the Postal Savings banks of this country. We have in our section of the country practically only one absolutely safe banking system. Bank after bank in the private banking system has crashed, carrying with it the savings of many people of a lifetime. For one, I want to see one banking institution left under the American flag which the people can look upon as sound and safe and which is in fact safe, and that is the Postal Savings banks. We are compelled to go out, as we have here in recent months, and borrow money from private bankers at $4\frac{1}{4}$ percent, when the Postal Savings banks pay 2 percent, to get for the Government the money it needs. With that picture confronting us, it presents rather a somber aspect to destroy the usefulness of these banks. I share very much the view of my colleague [Mr. DILL] in that respect.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, we, of course, do not propose to destroy the Postal Savings banks. If we had intended to undertake to do that, we would have put such a prohibition into the bill. The Postal Savings bank is involved in the bill only because we want to correct a frightful abuse in the commercial banking system of the country, which cannot be done if we do not put the Postal Savings Bank System upon the same terms of regulation as that upon which we put the commercial banks. That is why the Postal Banking System is involved at all.

There is just one more item of discussion here. The banks of the country almost universally are protesting against the assessment of one half of 1 percent upon their time and demand deposits as a contribution to the capital fund set up to insure bank deposits. The aggregate of the sum that will be exacted from the member banks under the one half of 1 percent assessment in order to insure the deposits in all the member banks is $175,000,000. If the banks are relieved of the competitive necessity of bidding for demand deposits on interest, they will not only have money to meet this assessment of one half of 1 percent to insure deposits, but they will have almost an equal amount left over. I have no doubt in the world that a vast majority of the commercial banks of the country will be glad to be prohibited by law from engaging in this competition of interest on demand deposits.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the amendment now pending is the one offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], I believe?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not care to discuss that amendment, but I desire to suggest that I have an amendment pending which will probably be brought before the Senate when the pending amendment is disposed of, with reference to the matter of Postal Savings banks. As I understand the bill, it prohibits the payment of interest by commercial banks on demand deposits. If that provision becomes the law, and the present law with reference to Postal Savings banks is retained, the Government is offering a premium to withdraw money from commercial banks and carry it across the street and put it in Postal Savings banks, because depositors can get 2 percent interest in the Postal Savings bank and they can get nothing in the way of interest in the commercial bank.

If the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] is correct that the Government ought to go into the general banking business, all right, that is one thing; but for it to undertake to set up a commercial banking system and then immediately attempt to destroy that system by setting up a competitor across the street and arming it with an advantage which the commercial banks are prohibited from employing, it seems to me the Government is adopting a ridiculous policy.

The amendment which I propose is to prohibit the payment of interest in Postal Savings banks, but not to destroy those banks. If the people want safety, if depositors will not trust the commercial banks, they can deposit their money in the Postal Savings banks, but will get no interest on it under my amendment.

I want to show what these banks are doing. I live in a rural community in a small county-seat town. The Postal Savings bank will do more harm to the small bank than to the large bank. Here is a rural community. Its cash resources are in no event large. The bank does not have a great deal of cash on deposit. The Postal Savings bank is competing with it. The local bank cannot get deposits from the Government, even for its local savings deposits, unless it purchases Government bonds and places them with the Treasury. What does that mean? It means that the local banks suffer the withdrawal of that much money from circulation in the community either by staying in the Postal Savings bank or if a local bank gets the deposit it has to spend an equal amount of cash to purchase Government bonds to put up as collateral for borrowing back from the Government what it loses through the Postal Savings bank account.

I have no interest in this except that I believe if we are going to prohibit the payment of interest by commercial banks, we ought to prohibit the payment of interest by the Postal Savings bank.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. DILL. If we are going to prohibit the Postal Savings banks from paying interest and allow the commercial savings banks to accept deposits and pay out those deposits on demand, why should we require the Postal Savings banks to permit no withdrawal of deposits made therein except after 60 days?

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Government is paying no interest I do not object to the depositor withdrawing his money whenever he gets ready. If we prohibit the payment of interest by the Postal Savings bank and simply allow the Government to furnish a safe depository for the funds of its citizens, I see no objection to permitting the depositor to withdraw his funds at any time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course the question of cost does not count for much in these matters, but I want to invite the Senator's attention to the fact that the cost of the Postal Savings bank, run in the interest of the poor man, the small depositor, is $4,255,000 a year. Under the system we have thus created the Government pays 2-percent interest on deposits and then puts those deposits into a Government depository at 2½-percent interest, and that means that it pays the entire expense and cost to the Postal Savings System. It seems to me that does away with every objection. In addition to that, it brings in $1,000,000 a year to the Government at the same time.

Why should not the small people, the people who do not know anything about banks but who do know about their Government, who know that it is safe, be able to deposit their money and get it when they want to, and get 2-percent interest on it? The Government loses nothing, because the banks are perfectly delighted to pay the 2½-percent interest and give a bond in order to get the funds.

Under these circumstances it seems to me that it is a peculiarly ideal system which has grown up since 1910, one of the most popular small banking systems that was ever carried into operation in this or any other country. It seems to me it is an admirable system to be continued.

Let me call the Senator's attention to the further fact that while our Federal Reserve System has not functioned as it should, while our State banks have not functioned as they should, as we all know—and I am not speaking in criticism of them—while the big concerns were failing, the ordinary, everyday people who use the Postal Savings banks have gone along just as usual and even as prosperous. It is a fine system. It is a system that I think we should not destroy, but if we agree to the proposal in the bill we will destroy it. I am in favor of the provision which prevents the commercial banks from paying interest on demand deposits. I do not object to that at all. But surely we ought not to destroy this splendid system of banking which has proven its worth and stability for nearly 25 years.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. May I intervene to say that the fancy of the Senator from Tennessee gets the better of his judgment and perverts the facts in the case. Nobody is attempting to destroy the Postal Savings bank.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was going to make that same observation.

Mr. GLASS. The committee is not attempting to destroy the Postal Savings bank.

Mr. McKELLAR. While a question of fact is being raised, let me ask the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], who is the author of the amendment, if it is not true that he is opposed to the Postal Savings Bank System?

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I do not think that has any reference to the question before the Senate.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall yield to the Senator from Colorado in a moment.

Mr. ADAMS. I want to make just an observation which I think in part answers the Senator's question. I want to know how the bank which is forbidden to pay interest on its demand deposits is going to pay interest on the Postal Savings bank deposits which come to that bank, inasmuch as the Postal Savings bank deposits in banks are demand deposits.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say first in answer to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] that he makes the point that the Postal Savings banks cost the Government $4,000,000 a year to maintain. Under my amendment, if we cut off payment of interest by the Government we shall cut down the cost of maintaining them. Whatever interest the Government gets for the use of money will be velvet to the Government. Let me say to the Senator from Tennessee, furthermore, that I can readily understand how the payment of interest by commercial banks is becoming a racket, and I shall show the Senator why.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not opposed to that.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, but the Senator said he was!

Mr. McKELLAR. No; only to the provision about the Postal Savings System.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understood the Senator to say that he was opposed to the provision in the bill which prevents the payment of interest on demand deposits.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, quite the contrary!

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. McKELLAR. The provision to which I object, and which my amendment is designed to correct, is—

Mr. CONNALLY. The 60-day provision?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; my amendment is simply to exclude Postal Savings banks from that rule, and leave them as they are, as the banks of the poor people of this country.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the payment of interest on time deposits by banks has become a racket. If you have a thousand dollars or $2,000 or a small account in a commercial bank, you do not get any interest on it. Take the case of some industrial concern with a large deposit, however, and what happens? Every bank in town is bidding to get that deposit; and the payment of interest on it is a form of rebate, a form of preference by which the banks accumulate these large deposits, and the ordinary depositor of the bank is bearing the burden. They are operating on his money and are paying preferential interest to industrial concerns and business concerns whose business they want to obtain.

So I believe the committee is right when it prohibits the payment of interest on demand deposits by commercial banks. A lot of the big banks are against it. Why? Because they want to be in position to bid for the country banker's deposits, and in order to do that they want the power to pay interest. I am with the committee on that provision; but if that is sound, if we are going to cut off the payment of interest by commercial banks on their deposits, we ought also to cut off the payment of interest by Postal Savings banks.

I have here some statistics that I should like to call to the attention of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CONALLY. I do.

Mr. McCARRAN. Before the Senator from Texas proceeds, will he kindly answer the query propounded by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS]?

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not understand that it was a query. I understood that he was making a statement in answer to the Senator from Tennessee. I shall yield again to the Senator, if he desires.

Mr. McCARRAN. I understood that the Senator from Colorado asked a question.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not know whether I was making an inquiry or a suggestion, but this may be the inquiry:

How can the Postal Savings bank collect interest from member banks? Mind you, the Postal Savings bank can deposit its funds only with member banks. By this bill member banks will be forbidden to pay interest on demand deposits. Postal Savings bank deposits—that is, those made by the Postal Savings banks in the member banks—have been demand deposits. Therefore, if no interest can be paid to the Postal Savings bank, how is the Postal Savings bank going to pay interest to its depositors?

Mr. CONNALLY. Under the law, are the Postal Savings banks prohibited from making time deposits in commercial banks?

Mr. ADAMS. They are not prohibited, no; but their deposits have been payable on demand. Therefore they have made their deposits subject to call when they needed them.

Mr. CONNALLY. Under the proposed law, though, we are making the Postal Savings time deposits. If the Postal Savings System had the power under the law also to make time deposits in commercial banks, it would try to adjust them in that way.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to some statistics with reference to the increase in Postal Savings bank deposits because of the pressure on the commercial banks within the last few months.

In the United States on June 30, 1931, there were on deposit in the Postal Savings banks $347,416,870.

On June 30, 1932, a year later, that sum had doubled. There were on deposit $784,820,623.

Six months later, on the 31st of December 1932, that sum had increased to $900,238,726.

On the 31st of March 1933, 3 months later, that sum had increased to $1,111,575,385.

So that in about 18 months the Postal Savings had almost quadrupled in amount.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DILL. Of course the Senator does not mean to imply that the great increase in the last few months was due to the payment of interest.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I do not.

Mr. DILL. It was due to the fact that it was one place where the little man knew his money was safe.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is right.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Just a moment; let me answer that. I thank the Senator from Washington for that interruption, because it shows that these depositors were more interested in safety than they were in interest.

It shows that if we take away all interest, and still preserve the system, the man who is concerned with safety and security will still utilize the Postal Savings System, and that he has not been actuated entirely by the consideration of interest. By this bill, however, we are introducing the other element, because under this bill we are prohibiting the commercial bank from paying interest, and we are permitting the Postal Savings bank to pay interest. In that way we give the depositor two inducements for putting his money into the Postal Savings System—one, safety; the other, interest, which he cannot get from a commercial bank.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. In a moment. So, instead of 4 times as many withdrawals, we shall probably have a larger proportion of withdrawals, because we shall have two motives operating on the human intellect instead of one.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Do not those figures show that there is over a billion dollars in the Postal Savings banks of this country that flow into trade and business and commerce with perfect freedom? The depositors put them in the Postal Savings banks; they take them out at will. Is not that the only billion dollars in this country that is free to go into trade and commerce?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not dispute the billion dollars, but I do dispute the freedom of movement. These Postal Savings accounts accumulate in the large cities. They operate to drain the rural communities, and I shall tell the Senator why.

Here is a small town with a small bank and a small amount of postal deposits. As I suggested awhile ago, in order to get those deposits back into the local bank it has to buy Government bonds; and the buying of those Government bonds takes just as much money as the bank will get back in Postal Savings. So the operation of the process is to drain that much cash out of that community. It is gone. The big banks in the great centers, on the other hand, always have plenty of bonds. They always have plenty of securities which, when they need cash, they can go over and deposit with the Government and get the Postal Savings accounts. Therefore the operation of the Postal Savings System with the payment of interest is to drain all of this money out of the little banks in the small communities and concentrate it in the great centers.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield for a question.

Mr. BONE. Is it not a fact that most of the small banks of the country have kept their surpluses on deposit in New York? Regardless of the contention that the Senator makes with respect to Postal Savings accounts, is it not a fact that most of the small banks have retained their balances in New York?

Mr. CONNALLY. I cannot say as to most of them. A great many of them do, and I shall tell the Senator the reason why that is done. It is because the banks in New York give the small banks interest on their deposits, and we are cutting that off. We are trying to circumvent the process by which the big banks will bid for the deposits of the small ones, in order that they may not drain to the great centers the resources of the small banks; and the same process of reasoning is an argument why that result should not be accomplished in another way through the Postal Savings accounts. It operates in the same fashion. It tends to draw the money from the small rural communities and centralize it in the great cities.

Mr. President, I am not an enemy of the Postal Savings bank. Why was it established? It was not established in order that the Government might go into the banking business. It was not established for the purpose of offering high rates of interest to depositors. It was established purely in order to give a safe place of deposit for those people who preferred to use the Government as a depository rather than the private commercial banks.

I am not speaking for the banks. I am speaking for the people whom the banks serve. Why have all of this banking legislation? People talk about passing a bill for the aid of the banks. That is not our concern. Our concern is to pass legislation which will permit the establishment and operation of a banking system in order that it may serve the public, that it may serve the people, that it may furnish a reservoir of credit and money with which the people of this country can transact their normal business. The Government does not owe the Postal Savings depositors anything except security.

I dare say if the Senator from Tennessee would examine the records he would find that the Government does not make a dollar out of the Postal Savings. I dare say that the System is a liability. I dare say that the Government does not get back, through the 2½-percent interest which it gets from the member-bank depositories, as much money as it pays out in interest to the Postal Savings bank depositors.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have here a report from the official of the Post Office Department who has charge of this very matter; and, according to that report, the profit from the System last year was $1,023,901.77.

I want to say to the Senator that this change is being made over the protest of the Post Office Department—

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, to be sure.

Mr. McKELLAR. And over the protest of those who are in favor of the Postal Savings System. I do not think it ought to be incorporated in this bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course, it is over the protest of the Post Office Department. Whenever the Congress entrusts any function to any Government bureau anywhere, it never disturbs the function with the consent of that bureau; of course not. If the Congress gives them a little function to perform, they not only will not surrender that function but they are up here at the next session of Congress asking that the function be extended, and that they have more employees and another bureau to help carry it on.

Let me say to the Senator from Tennessee also, as to this $1,023,000 that the Government is said to have made, that I dare say there is not an item in the account that pays any of the expenses or the salaries of the postmasters that operate the system. I dare say there is no overhead charged up for the clerks here in the Department who are administering the system. That comes out of the Treasury. If we swallow the report of almost any Government agency, they will show us where they are making money for the Government. Why, yes; they can all show us where they are making money for the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will give the Senator the figures again. The gross income from this bureau, if it may be called a bureau, is $4,255,326.65; and after paying all the operating expenses of the system the balance is $1,023,901.77.

Mr. CONNALLY. What are those expenses? Do those operating expenses include the payment of clerks?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am giving the Senator the report of the department. He can easily see that over 80 percent of the entire amount received is used in the expenses of the system. I take it that that includes all the expenses of the department.

Mr. CONNALLY. Those expenses include the payment of interest, too?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course they do.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course they do. We have to pay 2 percent, and we get only 2½ percent; and if four fifths of the expense is made up of the payment of interest, we would have just that much more profit if we did not pay interest. Furthermore, in the elements of cost I dare say there is not a nickel charged up for the overhead of the Government department that is running the system. Of course the man who is operating it wants to convince Congress that it is performing a great function, and that he is making money for the Government. He cannot make much money for the Treasury, however, because not all of these funds are loaned out all the time. Some of them are lying in the Treasury, idle at times.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I want to get clear on the status we will be in if we leave the provision in the bill as it is written and adopt the Senator's amendment.

As I understand, the Senator's amendment forbids the payment of interest upon demand deposits in the Postal Savings banks.

Mr. CONNALLY. Any kind of deposits.

Mr. DILL. Any kind of deposits. Then the Postal Savings System cannot pay any interest at all.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is right.

Mr. DILL. And yet we may have commercial savings banks that may pay interest.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand so, under this bill, for time deposits.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is right.

Mr. DILL. Well, these are time deposits. Sixty-day deposits are time deposits.

Mr. CONNALLY. I call that a very short time deposit.

Mr. DILL. The Senator, then, proposes not to allow the Postal Savings System to pay any interest on time deposits?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do.

Mr. DILL. But he does allow the commercial savings banks to pay interest on time deposits.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas is not responsible for everything that is in the bill. I am attacking only this particular provision.

Mr. DILL. But there will be no demand deposits if this provision is adopted.

Mr. CONNALLY. My amendment does not disturb that provision.

Mr. DILL. Of course; but there will be no demand deposits.

Mr. CONNALLY. My amendment cuts off the interest.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. CONNALLY. Just a moment. Mr. President, I cannot see any reason why the Government should be in the banking business further than to give security to those who are afraid to put their money in the commercial banks. If this System is to be operated as a bank, then the money ought to go into the regular banks that we are establishing and providing for under this bill and under existing law.

I now yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I desire to advise the Senator that the requirement of the law is that deposits made in member banks by the Postal Savings banks must be withdrawable at any time. They cannot make time deposits.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. So what will be the result if the Senate does not adopt my amendment? The existing law provides that the Postal Savings banks can make only demand deposits in commercial banks.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, section 11 amends that. The purpose of section 11 is to stop that.

Mr. ADAMS. I think the Senator misunderstood my remark. One deposit is the deposit which the individual makes in the Postal Savings, the second is the one made by the Postal Savings bank with the local bank, and that must be a demand deposit.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, when the Government gets this money in the Postal Savings bank, it then undertakes to reloan it to commercial banks, and it requires the deposit of Government bonds to secure that. The Senator from Colorado points out that when that is done, those deposits are demand deposits. Under the law, they cannot be time deposits. Therefore the banks cannot pay the Government any interest on Postal Savings deposits. Yet the Government, in turn, would be paying 2 percent to the Postal Savings depositors, without being able to recoup its losses by reloaning the money to the commercial banks. That is the situation the Senator intended to point out, is it not?

Mr. ADAMS. That is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. That simply accentuates the contention I am undertaking to make, to the effect that the Government ought to maintain Postal Savings, if it is desirable, for the purpose of giving security to depositors, but it should not set up the Postal Savings as competitors with commercial banks and allow the Postal Savings to pay interest on deposits while denying that right to commercial or national banks.

My amendment is not offered now, but when the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is voted upon, I hope Senators will bear in mind the fact that my amendment will then be offered, and I hope to get a favorable vote.

Mr. President, in connection with the discussion of the Postal Savings System, I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks an address delivered by J. E. Woods, president of the Teague National Bank, of Teague, Tex., before the Texas Bankers' Association on February 13, 1933.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE POSTAL SAVINGS MENACE

(An address delivered by J. E. Woods, President Teague National Bank, Teague, Tex., before the fifth district meeting, Texas Bankers Association, Dallas, Tex., February 13, 1933)

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the convention: I shall not indulge in that favorite American pastime, "cussing the Government." But I shall try to present logically some observations supported by facts and authentic data to substantiate my conclusion that the present Postal Savings System is not only unfair competition to the banks of this country, but also in principle, it is inimical to the fundamentals upon which this Government was founded. I consider it an outrage—not only upon the banks, but upon the countless thousands of business men and institutions whose well-being depends upon a healthy banking structure. To me the serious encroachment which this iniquitous system is making upon the banking business of this country, the rapid rate of its increase, and the complacency with which bankers generally are accepting this imposition, are astounding.

BEGAN OPERATION IN 1911

The Postal Savings System was created by an act of Congress in 1910 and began its operation on January 2, 1911. On December 31, 1932, patrons of the System had on deposit in the post offices of this country more than $900,000,000. On these demand deposits your Government is paying annually, at the rate of 2 percent per annum, interest amounting to more than $18,000,000.

It was claimed that the possibility of large deposits being attracted to postal savings from the banks was guarded against by limiting the amount one person might have in the postal savings at any one post office to $2,500. Actual practice has made a joke of this provision of the law. It is a common evasion for a depositor to have the maximum amount on deposit in the name of his wife, his children, and other members of the family. Not only may he do that, but he can go to the post office in his neighboring town and do the same thing. In view of these evasions, we can reasonably believe that actually the average amount on deposit in the post offices to the credit of each patron is more than $1,000, rather than about $600 as shown by the reports of the operation of the System. The effect of the $2,500 maximum is also nullified by the provision for the issuance and sale of Postal Savings bonds bearing 2½ percent interest, into which patrons may, twice a year, convert their deposits, with no limit as to the amount of Postal Savings bonds one person may own. While these bonds are due 20 years from date, the Postal Savings System guarantees to purchase them at any time after date of issuance at par and accrued interest.

POSTMASTER GENERAL'S REPORT

I have a copy of the report made to Congress by the Postmaster General concerning Postal Savings System operations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, and a supplemental report bringing the figures up to December 31, 1932. The statements and data which I quote are gotten from these reports. The amount on deposit at every post office in the United States as of the date of the report is shown. The report indicates that banks in our smaller cities and towns having populations from 2,000 to 15,000 or 20,000 are the greatest sufferers from this inexcusable governmental competition. The report also reveals that banks in towns having a considerable industrial pay roll are the greatest sufferers. Friend banker of such towns as I have described, if you will take the time to go into this matter carefully and ascertain what has become of some of your good deposits on which you have in previous years been able to make a little profit, you will find that a surprising amount of them have gone to the post office, and that you are losing them at an increasingly rapid rate.

TWO PERCENT INTEREST SPOILS CUSTOMER

Let a depositor, who has been in the habit of carrying a nice reserve in the bank without interest, by suggestive advertising put out by the Post Office Department, or by reason of the solicitation of some Postal Savings convert, once make a deposit in the post office and get a taste of the 2 percent interest which the Postal Savings pays on a demand deposit—a rate which the banks cannot afford to pay on such a deposit—and this added to his knowledge of supersafety for his funds—that account is forever lost to the bank. In many cases that frugal-minded depositor becomes so thoroughly sold on this proposition that he becomes a self-appointed solicitor for the Postal Savings System, suggesting to his relatives, his friends, and coworkers, at every opportunity how nice it is to keep the money, that he has for years kept in the bank without interest, in Uncle Sam's bank and receive every 90 days 2 percent interest on it.

Recently a widow who was a customer of our bank, but a better patron of the Postal Savings, called to see me. She had just received a check for several thousand dollars in payment of an insurance policy on the life of her late husband and consulted me as to what she should do with her money. She explained that she wanted, in addition to absolute safety, a little income to aid her without using the principal. She was frank enough to tell me she had the limit in Postal Savings; that she had been advised by the Post Office employees that a bill was now pending in Congress to increase the maximum that one patron might have on deposit from $2,500 to $5,000. She seemed a little chagrined at the delay of Congress in passing such a bill. She stated further that the postmaster had tried to sell her some Postal Savings bonds yielding 2½ percent interest, but that she didn't want to tie her money up for that long a period. The post office employees evidently did not explain to her that the System would buy her bonds at par and interest any time she wanted to dispose of them, and, of course, I did not volunteer that information. I questioned her as to what kind of an investment she wanted and asked her how some Fourth Liberty Loan bonds would suit. "Well", she said, "I have some Liberty bonds, and it had never occurred to me until recently that United States bonds were not perfectly safe. But Mr. So-and-so told me that the Government was getting shaky and money invested in Liberty bonds might not be safe. He said he had sold his Liberty bonds and invested his money in postal savings, where it would be safe, and advised me to do the same thing." I have a friend who has a very unique way of expressing himself. He does not use the modern term of "sold" on a proposition, but instead he would say that is "peddled" on it. Believe me! The Postal Savings booster just mentioned was certainly "peddled" on the Postal Savings idea.

DEPOSITS ONCE GONE—GONE FOREVER

As would naturally be expected, Postal Savings deposits are greatest in towns where, in the past, there has been bank trouble. It is observed, however, and that is the most serious phase of the question, that once the depositor moves his reserve from the bank to the post office, it is gone from the bank for good. In cities where, in the past, there has been some bank trouble, although such bank trouble occurred a number of years ago, and since that time the town has been blessed with excellent banking facilities, there has been no noticeable return of these deposits from the post office to the banks. In one good city of this State where there was some bank trouble, although the trouble occurred more than 10 years ago, and since that time the city has had two excellent banks, both well managed, conservatively operated, and kept in a most liquid condition, there is on deposit in the post office more than $700,000, an amount far in excess of the total individual deposits of each of the banks. Many towns in Texas, as well as in other States, have more money in the post office than in the banks.

FOUR ADVERTISING POINTS STRESSED

Literally tons of high-powered advertising literature prepared by experts at the expense of the taxpayers of this country are sent out from Washington at frequent intervals to the post offices, where it is distributed among the patrons of the post office. I have a number of these leaflets and pamphlets in my office. These stress four attractive features: First, Government guaranty of deposits. Second, the attractive rate of interest. Third, the privilege of withdrawing the deposit on demand without loss of interest. Fourth, the absolute secrecy surrounding transactions with the Postal Savings System. On the cover of one of these pamphlets that I have is printed in bold-faced type, "The faith of the United States Government is solemnly pledged to the payment of the deposits made in Postal Savings depository offices." What more could they do to attract money from the banks to the post office? With conditions like they have been for the past 2 or 3 years and as they now exist, I am firm in my belief that the suggestion which this high-powered literature carries to the bank depositor has been the cause of starting bank runs that have resulted in the closing of a great number of banks that otherwise would have remained open and continued their most worthy service to the community.

A great deal of time has been taken up the past year debating proposed laws to reform the banks. We have become alarmed over the proposal to extend branch banking, but we seem to have lost sight of the fact that we have already a giant Government-owned bank with nearly 7,000 branches. Nothing has been proposed to remedy this situation. We frown upon the proposal to extend Federal guaranty of bank deposits, while in the Postal Savings System we already have it in a most vicious form. The reformers demand that the commercial banks divorce their investment affiliates while this giant institution has an investment affiliate at each of its 7,000 branches supplying its customers with an unlimited amount of Postal Savings bonds, bearing 2½ percent interest, which the System agrees to repurchase at par and accrued interest any time after date of issuance, these securities yielding a rate of interest entirely out of line with the current rates on other Government paper. In all of these debates the weakness of the country banks and the necessity for providing adequate laws for strengthening the country bank's structure has been stressed. As in every line of business, banking business has been hard hit, and there has, of course, been a lot of bank trouble. Let us bear in mind and let us have the public understand, nevertheless, that there are still plenty of good, sound, conservatively operated banks in this country. By eliminating this useless and unfair competition the banks would be more able to take care of themselves and there would be less need for help. The situation as it now exists presents the paradoxical picture of our great Uncle Sam with his strong right hand choking the breath of life out of us while with his left hand he administers a stimulant.

Conditions might exist, and conditions might arise in the future, that would justify the Federal Government maintaining facilities for the safe-keeping of scared funds that would otherwise be temporarily kept out of circulation. But in the name of justice, what reason can be advanced to require taxpayers of this country to maintain at an enormous expense a system that unfairly competes and is tearing down our banking structure by offering a rate of interest on demand deposits that the commercial banks cannot pay, in addition to providing supersafety for the depositor's funds? Why should we be taxed to enable the Postal Savings System to pay 2½ percent on deposits that are being taken away from our banks, when the Government pays us only one fifth of 1 percent on our funds on a time deposit of 90 days.

POSTAL DEPOSITS UNATTRACTIVE TO BANKS

Proponents of the System in Congress advanced the puerile argument that postal savings is not a detriment to the business community because, as money is deposited in the post office, it may be brought to the local bank and deposited, and thus kept in the community to do its bit in taking care of the credit requirements of the community. Yes! The laws do provide that 85 percent of the money deposited in postal savings may be deposited in the local bank, but only after the local bank has purchased and deposited with the Treasurer at Washington, United States and other eligible bonds to secure the deposit. Under normal times and normal interest rates, if the depository bank is fortunate in handling its bonds purchased to secure the Postal Savings depository, a very meager profit may be made on the funds. But, so far as the good that the deposit does the bank in supplying the credit needs of the community is concerned, that money might as well be locked up in the vaults of the Treasury at Washington, or invested in some distant land. Every dollar, therefore, put in postal savings means 100 cents sent out of the community, which, multiplied by 10, the usual formula for measuring the purchasing power of local deposits, means a decrease of $10 in credit and buying power of the community.

This suggests another phase of the question that I think is an outrage. With the extremely low yield on high-class investments available for use as collateral to secure Postal Savings deposits, banks have found that they cannot break even on Postal Savings deposits at 2½ percent interest, and they are returning these deposits at the rate of millions per day. More depository banks would return the deposits if they could liquidate the bonds that they have pledged to secure the deposit without taking a loss. I have been unable to ascertain the exact amount of Postal Savings deposits redeposited with depository banks, but at this time the amount probably does not exceed 65 percent of the total deposits—the balance, or 35 percent, is in Federal Reserve banks or in the Treasury with interest to the System. That means that the Government is paying out in interest to the depositors at the present $19,000,000 per year. This loss, added to the enormous administrative costs of operating the System, has to be paid by the taxpayers. Two percent per annum, the rate paid Postal Savings depositors, is far above the current yield on short-term Government paper. On December 28, 1932, the highest rate accepted by the Treasury on an offering of Treasury bills was 0.09 percent. Why this favoritism to the Postal Savings depositors? I submit that it is not right to tax the whole people to favor a few. It is wrong to build up one class by destroying another.

NEITHER ATTACHMENT NOR GARNISHMENT

Another outrage, and what seems to me to be the most shameful of the many outrageous features of the whole question a depositor may use the Postal Savings System as an instrumentality for beating his honest debts! A debtor may, and this is not an uncommon practice, convert his property into cash, deposit it in postal savings, and tell his creditors to go to the devil, because money on deposit in the post office cannot be reached by attachment and garnishment.

Let us not get the idea that the friends of Postal Savings in Congress are not active. At this time a bill is pending providing for raising the maximum amount that one depositor may have in one post office from $2,500 to $5,000, and a proposal has been made to provide facilities for checking accounts at every post office in the land! Then where will the banks be?

WRITE YOUR CONGRESSMAN

We must all admit that a lot of ill-advised laws are made at Washington because we don't let our Representatives know just how we feel about the matter. My observation and experience with Senators and Congressmen is that they are just people like the rest of us. They like to know how we feel about questions coming up in Congress, and are amenable to suggestions. We are promised a "new deal" at Washington beginning March 4. I believe that by a concerted effort of the bankers of the country, through appeals to our Representatives in the Senate and in the House, pleading our cause, that the most oppressive provisions of the Postal Savings law could be eliminated at the special session of Congress. If we take no action, passing it with the usual statement that we are not in politics, leaving the matter to others to handle, we will get no relief and perhaps in that case we would not deserve it. One of the reasons that nothing has been done about this important matter is because the country bankers have formed the habit of depending too much upon our influential bankers of the city to look after matters of this kind. The city bankers have such a volume of business that their loss direct to postal savings is negligible. The city bankers are our friends. When our institutions become acutely ill, they run to our assistance. But I fear that they do not understand the seriousness of the Postal Savings menace. These fellows have the ears of those in position to remedy this situation, and we should appeal to them for their help and cooperation in this matter. The operation of the Postal Savings System has never been justified. It has been detrimental to the business structure of the country and the law ought to be repealed outright. There is no reason in the world, however, for the payment of interest on these deposits. In view of the extremely low interest rates prevailing, I believe the time is ripe for action. By a determined effort the payment of interest on these deposits could be eliminated and the sale of Postal Savings bonds discontinued, and the interest which the local bank is required to pay reduced to a nominal figure on the basis of cost to the Government in operating the System without profit.

Get in touch with your Senators and Congressmen. Don't merely ask them to vote for such a measure. Give them the facts; convince them that the System is ruining the small-town banks, and ask them to become active in getting some relief. I don't believe that is an exaggerated statement when I say—if something is not done to relieve this situation, it will in time absolutely eliminate the so-called "country and small-city bank." Why not a united effort to check the evil before it goes too far? It is useless to lock the stable after the horse has been stolen.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, we ought to understand what this provision, section 11, means. It means that the Postal Savings banks are hereafter to be of no use to the little man who wants to put money in a place where he thinks it will be safe, and take out ten or fifteen dollars whenever he wants to. That is what it means. It has never been in any such condition.

At the present time—in fact, since the beginning of the Postal Savings System—anybody who put money in a Postal Savings bank could always go and secure any part of that money, and that has been of especial value to the small depositor. I do not believe there is any sentiment among the American people today to have that privilege taken away.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that that is absolutely true today. When one puts money in other banks, there may be some doubt about it, but when a man goes and puts his money into the Postal Savings he knows he can get it whenever he wants it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, as I understand the position of the Senator from Washington, it is not that he objects to the provision about interest so much as that he wants to grant the right to deposit in Postal Savings banks funds which do not draw interest.

Mr. DILL. I am in full sympathy with the amendment of the Senator from Texas. If the commercial banks are not to be allowed to pay interest, then certainly we should not give the Postal Savings bank a preference right. The thing I am opposing is saying to the man who goes and puts $40 or $50 into the Postal Savings bank, the man who wants to put it there, that he must wait 60 days to draw it. It may be said he ought to have faith in the private bank, but you cannot change the fact that he does not have faith in it. If he has forty or fifty dollars in the Postal Savings bank, it ought not to be only on condition that he would have to wait 60 days before being able to get it out.

Mr. TYDINGS. It struck me that the point at issue might possibly be satisfactorily taken care of, in view of the position taken by the Senator from Virginia, with whose general philosophy I am in accord in this matter, by inserting on page 50, line 4, after the word "deposit", the words "upon which interest shall accrue."

Mr. DILL. I have no objection.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then it would read:

No deposit upon which interest shall accrue shall be made with any Postal Savings depository for a period of less than 60 days.

Mr. DILL. Of course, if that amendment is in the bill, I would have no objection.

Mr. TYDINGS. It struck me that that would, in effect, prevent the Postal Savings people from paying interest on general deposits unless they were deposited for a period of more than 60 days, and both sides of this controversy would, in effect, get what they seem to want.

Mr. DILL. The part of this section to which I am objecting—

Mr. TYDINGS. Would the Senator accept that amendment?

Mr. DILL. I have no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if that were done, it would cause the Government to pay interest on the funds, but it would give the Government no opportunity of recouping itself.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator misunderstood my suggestion—if he will wait just a moment. I will take but a second.

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. What I was trying to do was to provide that where sums are deposited for more than 60 days—that is, when they become time deposits—then interest shall be paid, but where a man has the right to draw the money out the following day, or 10 days hence, no interest shall be charged upon it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator overlooks the fact that on pages 48 and 49 there is this provision—I read from the bottom of page 48:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as prohibiting the payment of interest in accordance with the terms of any certificate of deposit or other contract heretofore entered into in good faith which is in force on the date of the enactment of this paragraph.

"This paragraph" is, "No member bank shall, directly or indirectly", and so forth.

Mr. TYDINGS. I suggest to the Senator that that would not affect it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it would, absolutely.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I think the amendment of the Senator from Maryland would not interfere with the demand deposits. There is no justification, as I see it, for the competition which we would create if we allowed the Postal Savings banks to pay interest on time deposits, when we do not allow the commercial banks to do it.

The thing I am objecting to about this section as it stands here is that the man with a little bit of money would not be able to get any of it out for 60 days. The amendment of the Senator from Maryland would permit that to be done.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. McADOO. I think perhaps this amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland clarifies the situation very much. It makes it clear that if a Postal Savings depositor draws his money on demand, so to speak, he gets no interest, and it is, of course, important to preserve that right, and the intention of the committee was, I think, to preserve that right, but to put the Postal Savings banks on a parity with the commercial banks, which are permitted to pay interest on time deposits.

The point has been made here, and I think very properly made, that under the law as it now stands the Postal Savings banks are required to deposit their moneys with member banks of the Federal Reserve System on demand, taking from the member banks security therefor. I have never liked that method, because it does give the Government a priority over all the other depositors in a bank, and in case of the failure of a bank the other depositors are relegated, for the recoupment of their deposits, to the poorest securities in the bank.

I think that difficulty could be met by doing this: It will be necessary, under this plan, that the Postal Savings banks may make deposits with the member banks on time, at interest, because, as I said before, the law as it stands now requires that they shall make deposits on demand, and if we prevent the member banks from paying interest on demand deposits, they will be put at a disadvantage.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I hope I still have the floor. I was yielding to the Senator.

Mr. McADOO. I was just trying to bring out that point, for the Senator's information, and to make a suggestion. I think that we should add a proviso—I have not had a chance to consult with my colleagues on the subject—to this effect: "Provided, That Postal Savings depositories may deposit funds in banks on time, under regulations to be prescribed by the Postmaster General." I think that would cover the situation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Maryland appeals to me as meeting the situation I want to have taken care of, and I am very glad to know the committee is not intending to make it impossible for a man with a small deposit to withdraw his funds from time to time.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I see no objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. DILL. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is an amendment pending. I want to say this about it, that it is better than the present provision in the bill, but it does not meet this fundamental situation. This is the first step—and we might as well recognize it—in destroying the Postal Savings System, in the interest of the commercial banks. We might as well understand that. It would necessarily destroy it.

Mr. DILL. The Senator is no better friend of the Postal Savings System than I am, and I should like to ask him this question: How can we justify taking away from the commercial bank the right to pay interest on demand deposits, and grant that right to the Postal Savings bank?

Mr. McKELLAR. Simply because it is a governmental function. That is the only way in the world it can be done. We have made the exception in favor of the Government from time immemorial, and there is no reason why we should not do it in this case, in my judgment.

If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him just a moment, when you take away the right of a depositor in the Postal Savings bank to take his money out whenever he or she desires, you are destroying the System.

Mr. DILL. That is what I objected to, but the Senator from Maryland has offered an amendment which the subcommittee is willing to accept, which restores that right.

Mr. McKELLAR. It does not restore that right. It restores the right only to the extent of time deposits.

Mr. DILL. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I do not understand the amendment.

Mr. GLASS. No; the Senator does not. The Senator had a nightmare, that is all.

Mr. McKELLAR. No, I did not. I know it is undertaking to destroy this system.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I do not know what the undertaking is, but I know the thing about which I am concerned, that is, that we shall not prohibit the man with a small deposit from going in and withdrawing a small amount from time to time. I think that is the purpose of the Senator from Maryland, and the subcommittee, and if that is the effect, then I have no objection to this amendment.

I want to say this, that I have drawn an amendment with considerable care to provide for checking accounts in these demand deposits, and my reason for that was that I believed that the small depositor was entitled to a place where he could have safety and a checking account. Now the committee has accepted the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, which removes much of the reason which I had for offering that amendment. I still believe that until the system is working, it might be desirable to have in the law the checking provision as to Postal Savings accounts, but I am not so anxious about it as I was.

I do want to see that the people who have been putting their money in the Postal Savings, and still want to do that for a little while, until this thing proves to be safe, shall not be cut out by any such language as is before us.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the committee will accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maryland, and, further, the amendment suggested by the Senator from California, which clarifies the whole situation, as I see it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I merely rose for the purpose of interrupting the Senator from Washington to suggest the importance of preserving this opportunity to small depositors to find a place where their deposits are welcome during this stressful period.

As Senators well know, many banks discourage small deposits because they find that as a matter of commercial operation the necessary bookkeeping and accounting makes them unprofitable. Yet for persons who have only small deposits to make, the opportunity to make them is perhaps of even greater importance than to people who have larger deposits to make. I certainly hope that some suggestion will be worked out whereby the right of the small depositor to find a welcome and a safe depository for his small account will be preserved.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I submit an amendment and ask permission that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator offer the amendment to this bill?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that we expect to finish the consideration of the bill this afternoon.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I will call it up later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table and will be in order later.

Mr. LOGAN. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], which provides, I believe, that the words "upon which interest shall accrue" shall be interpolated after the word "deposit", in line 4, would not change the effect of the remainder of the proposed act. However, my colleague [Mr. DILL] referred to the case of the depositor in a Postal Savings bank who expected to receive interest and would be compelled to wait for the 60-day period to expire. That is one of the things I myself was objecting to. I feel that there should be a wider latitude given the little depositor in the Postal Savings banks. I think we all realize and appreciate that the little fellow on his deposit there wants to earn a little interest, a few dollars. That means a great deal to him.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. What the Senator has stated is true. As I understand, the point made by the Senator's colleague was that he was willing for the savings feature to be on the same plane with the general banking business features, and what he desired was the right of the little depositor to have a place where he could keep, without interest, his funds for a day or a month or any length of time he wished.

Mr. BONE. That is very true. Personally, I should like to see the checking system devised such as my colleague has suggested, without interest, where it is purely a checking operation with, perhaps, a nominal charge of 1 cent or 2 cents per check. That, however, is not a part of this argument, to be sure; but I think in voting on this question we should all understand that the person who desires to withdraw his or her money from a Postal Savings bank within the 60-day period is losing all interest; and I do not believe the American people will like that.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if I had not said a word or two about the Postal Savings question, I would not delay a vote on this matter, and I do not now want to delay a vote. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has spoken about the little man getting benefits out of the Postal Savings Bank System. Had the Senator thought a little further—because he has had the experience in his State which we have had in ours—he would realize that the Postal Savings Bank System has not done the depositors of the United States any good at all. What the Postal Savings Bank System has done with these little communities like Huntington, Tenn., and Bell, Tenn., and other little places—where I was many years ago—is this: They take the money that the people have in those little towns and draw it into Memphis, and the little man in the little town of Huntington or the little town of Bell has never been able to borrow a dollar of that money at the Postal Savings bank. It has gone to Memphis and Nashville and other money centers.

That is not all it has done. Talking about the protection that it has given to the man who has deposited money, here is what it has done to him: When the Post Office Department deposited in the banks in Nashville—some of which closed their doors—the Postal Savings money they made the bank put up the cream of its assets; Government bonds had to be put up to protect the Postal Savings funds. Then, when a bank got shaky, the only one who could get its money back was the Post Office, and the other millions of depositors in those banks had nothing out of which they could get their money because the banks had given the Government the cream to secure the Post Office funds. One of the greatest disasters that has ever happened to the banking institutions of this country is the Postal Savings Bank System, because, after the Postal Savings Bank System takes the farmer's money away from him and sends it to the cities, the farmer cannot borrow a cent or a dime of it, and the Government deposits are then preferred, leaving the poor ordinary man without anything whatever to get a dime on when the bank fails.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before we vote, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the amendment. I will read first from the bill, at the bottom of page 48, and then will read the amendment which I have offered:

No member bank shall, directly or indirectly by any device whatsoever, pay any interest on any deposit which is payable unconditionally on demand: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as prohibiting—

At that point I propose to insert these words:

money from being deposited as Postal Savings or from drawing interest as now provided by law or in any manner repealing or modifying the present law governing the receipt by the Government of Postal Savings and their management and control.

If this language shall be voted into the bill the Postal Savings System will constitute an exception to the general provision that I have just read, that is that no interest shall be allowed on demand deposits.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that not in a small place but in one of the larger cities in my State the banks unfortunately all failed and the increase in Postal Savings bank deposits, if I recall the figures aright—I may be wrong about it—was somewhere in the neighborhood of about fiftyfold. In other words, the only place where those who had money to deposit could go and put their money and be assured that they could draw it out was in the Postal Savings banks. Today that is so all over this entire Republic. The only safe place for the small depositor to put his money is in Postal Savings Bank System. It pays for itself; it is an exception to the general rule that has been put in, with which I have no complaint and no quarrel at all of any kind.

I simply ask that the Postal Savings System be allowed to stand just as it is and that we shall not take the first step to destroy it. If it ought to be destroyed, let somebody introduce a bill to repeal it, and then it would come up upon its own merits; but certainly in this way the Postal Savings Bank System ought not to be destroyed.

I am pleading for the small depositor, for the little fellow, who has just a little money and wants to save it, and to be certain that he can use it when he wants it. Surely, in enacting this bill, we ought not to make it harder for the little fellow who has only a few funds to put them in a safe place and to take them out whenever he wants to do so.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LONG. How would the Senator feel about the little man who has no money and who cannot borrow a dime from the Postal Savings bank?

Mr. McKELLAR. From personal experience I feel very sorry for such a man. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Very well. Then the Senator admits that he wants to see hampered the institution that can lend the man money, when we have already written into this bill a guaranty of bank deposits under $2,500?

Mr. McKELLAR. We do not know whether that is going to remain in the bill or not.

Mr. President, I hope I may have the yeas and nays on the amendment. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], on which he demands the yeas and nays. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in order that the record may be complete I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 49, in line 22, it is proposed to strike out all of subsection (c) down to and including line 17 on page 50.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, merely for the RECORD, I desire to say that I have offered an amendment similar to the one offered by the Senator from Tennessee to strike out all of subsection (c), and my amendment covers the same ground as the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 50, line 7, beginning with the first comma, it is proposed to strike through the comma following to the word "thereon", as follows:

Or the accrued interest thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I will consume only a moment. This is the amendment to which I referred a little while ago. Its whole effect is simply to prohibit the payment of interest on Postal Savings deposits. It does not destroy the System; it provides safety and security for the depositor; but it denies payment of interest in order that the Government may not compete with commercial banks and enjoy an unfair advantage. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not understand the amendment exactly. May I ask the Senator from Texas to explain again what would be the effect of the amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY. The effect would be to deny the payment of interest on Postal Savings deposits, whether demand or time deposits.

Mr. TYDINGS. There would not be any interest paid on any of them?

Mr. CONNALLY. No.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is what I understood.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I think this is such an important matter, and I am so opposed to it, that I am going to ask for the yeas and nays, but before doing so I wish to make a brief statement.

I have been somewhat surprised to hear Senators stand on the floor of the Senate today and talk about the protection of the commercial banks and intimate that the trouble with the banking system of this country today is possibly the competition of the Postal Savings bank, so-called. It should be borne in mind, it seems to me, that the only safe place of deposit in the United States of America during the last 6 months, or possibly a year, has been the Postal Savings banks.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. And since the year 1900 I believe the statistics show that there have been about 11,000 failures of privately controlled banks in this country.

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the Senator for his contribution. With 11,000 bank failures, the Senator from Texas calls attention to how the deposits have increased in the Postal Savings banks. Is there any wonder in the world, when other banks have been looted by crooked bankers, in some instances, and in other instances have been looted by the big bankers forcing the small bankers to take a lot of worthless bonds?

A banker from my State was in my office this morning, one of the most honorable, reputable bankers in the State. He has run his bank in a very high-class way, in a decent, orderly fashion. There has been no speculation, no gambling, but the bank did purchase bonds that were unloaded upon them by some of the big banks. When the House of Morgan sent them bonds and said to them, "These are high-class no. 1 bonds", they bought them thinking they could rely upon the reputation of that house and similar houses. But they had to take a loss on their bonds to the extent of $128,000. They took a loss to such an extent that as a matter of fact the bank was closed. It was not in that instance because of anything the bank did, but solely because of the fact that they relied upon the confidence they had in the New York bankers whom we have let run this Government of ours during the last 10 or 15 years, particularly the financial end of the Government.

Mr. President, we are seeking to destroy the Postal Savings bank, the only place the workingman with a few hundred dollars has to put his money with safety.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McADOO. I believe, if the Senator will allow me to say so, that he is wholly in error in saying that there is any attempt to destroy the Postal Savings bank. We want to conserve it. The amendment now practically agreed upon preserves the institution in full force, except that we do not permit the Postal Savings banks to pay interest on demand deposits, just as we are not going to permit commercial banks to pay interest on demand deposits.

Mr. WHEELER. That is quite a different thing. The little man comes in and deposits two or three hundred dollars in the Postal Savings bank. We have been saying to the working men of the country, "Save your money and buy a home and you will be a better American citizen." He has taken his little savings to a commercial bank and the bank has failed and he has lost his money there through no fault of his own. So we establish the Postal Savings System and we say to the man with his savings, "We are going to give you 2 percent upon your money", and now it is proposed to take away that 2 percent. There is no excuse for that. The commercial banks are not paying any interest at the present time on small deposits of $100 or $200 or $300. The fight over deposits has been, as I understand it, and the complaint has been that the banks have been fighting for the larger deposits. They are not fighting for the little deposits. They are not paying high rates of interest or any rates of interest for the little deposits.

Under the bill we are proposing to give the little fellow 2 percent upon his money and we are going to give him a safe place to deposit it. If we had not had the Postal Savings System what would have happened? Instead of this money being deposited in the Postal Savings bank it would have been hidden in an old sock or an old shoe or buried in the ground some place. It would have been hoarded. The people would not have spent it. Instead of that, however, it has been put in the Postal Savings bank because they knew it was safe and that they were going to get a meager 2-percent interest upon it.

But some people are so much interested in protecting the bankers who have to a large extent wrecked the country that they want to take away the right of the little man to have 2-percent interest upon his money, because it is said the Postal Savings bank is going to compete with the commercial banks of the Nation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator said something about the money being hoarded. A lot of it would have been put in the 11,000 banks that have failed and it would have gone out of circulation in that way.

Mr. WHEELER. Why, of course.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator from Montana is addressing himself to the proposition presented by the Senator from Texas I have no quarrel with him.

Mr. WHEELER. That is what I am doing.

Mr. GLASS. But the bill itself, with the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] and the other amendments suggested by the Senator from California [Mr. McANULTY]—

Mr. WHEELER. Let me interrupt the Senator from Virginia to say that I am addressing myself to the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] which proposes to prohibit the paying of 2-percent interest. I think we ought to pay it. I am not in favor of paying interest to a man who deposits his money for a few days only, but if he deposits for a period of 90 days or 6 months he ought to be able to get 2-percent interest on his money. It is not right and fair for the Government not to pay that interest.

I hope the Senate of the United States will protect the little depositors. We have not sought to protect the depositors. We have left them at the mercy of the bank looters. The Government of the United States is responsible to some extent for the conditions in which we find the banks today. The Government of the United States has been derelict in its duty in its examination of some of these banks.

My attention was called the other night by a responsible party in the city of Washington to the recent failure of a prominent bank in this city—the Park Savings Bank. I was told that every time the bank was about to be examined somebody in that bank was notified that it was to be examined, and then some official in the Treasury Department who was borrowing money from the bank paid off his loan temporarily and the money was placed back in the bank just before the examination, and then more money was loaned to this official just after the examination.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. Is it clear to the Senator from Montana that the effort of the committee has been to make deposits in small banks safe for all depositors? In the meantime we have not suggested any change in the Postal Savings System or in the policy underlying it further than was necessitated by the provision in our bill prohibiting the payment of interest upon demand deposits. The committee is opposed to the Connally amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. I was not criticizing the committee. I was talking about the Connally amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. I was hopeful that we could get a vote.

Mr. WHEELER. All right. With the assurance that the committee is going to vote with me on the Connally amendment I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, since the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] has so violently attacked the amendment I desire to submit a few remarks in reply. The Senator from Montana denounces the banking policies of many bankers of the country.

The Senator from Montana said that a Montana banker recently called at his office, that he was an honest high-minded banker, but he had been induced by New York bankers to invest the bank's money in bonds, which later proved to be practically worthless, and that as a result the bank failed. His bank failed, not because he stole the bank's money, but because he did not have judgment enough to prevent somebody in New York from selling him a lot of fake bonds.

The situation so far as that community is concerned is just as bad as if the banker had stolen the money and gone to Canada, which is not far from Montana. [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, the fact is that the bank was wrecked. The bank is insolvent. The depositors have lost their money. We are trying to legislate here to protect the public, not the banks. No one is concerned with the banks. I did own stock in 2 or 3 but they have busted. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must admonish the occupants of the gallery that they are present by courtesy of the Senate, and that demonstrations of approval or disapproval are not permitted.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not concerned with aiding the banks, but I am concerned with making it possible for banks to do business. I am anxious that banks may function, not for their own sake, but for the people who have to have banks to help run their business and for the purpose of getting credit.

I deny the inference of the Senator from Montana that anyone is trying to destroy the Postal Savings System. My amendment does not destroy it. It preserves it. But it does provide that the Postal Savings bank shall not have an undue advantage, under the sanction of the Government, over the commercial banks.

Let us see what has happened. We provided that the Postal Savings banks could pay only 2 percent interest. That meant that the interest rate was less than commercial banks were paying. At that time commercial banks were paying 3 or 4 percent on deposits, so we provided by law that the Postal Savings banks could pay only 2 percent. We did not intend that they should be on a parity with private banks. We intended they should have some disadvantage because they were safe, because the Government was guaranteeing the deposits in the Postal Savings banks, and so we provided that their interest rate should be lower than that which depositors might receive from commercial banks. That is the fact.

Now it is proposed to reverse that policy. Now the bill proposes to provide that commercial banks shall pay no interest on demand deposits, but that we shall give the Postal Savings banks an advantage by permitting them to pay interest on deposits. The process has been reversed. We started out by giving the commercial banks an advantage over the Postal Savings banks. In consideration of the safety which goes with Postal Savings banks we were willing to let them get less interest. Now it is proposed, not only to give safety to the Postal Savings banks, but to pay them a premium, to drain the money out of the small communities and send it into the great money centers where the Postal Savings will ultimately find their way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, since offering awhile ago the amendment, on page 50, line 4, inserting after the word "deposit" the words "upon which interest shall accrue", I have conferred with the legislative counsel; and, without having a chance to digest fully what he has prepared, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which purports to carry out the intention I formerly expressed when I had the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, with the accrued interest, only on notice given 60 days in advance, and under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe; but withdrawals of any part of such funds may be made upon demand, but no interest shall be paid on any funds so withdrawn.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator where this amendment would come in?

Mr. TYDINGS. It would be in lieu of the language on page 50, line 3, after the word "following"—in lieu of the remainder of that paragraph.

Mr. President, from a reading of this amendment it seems to be all right, so I suggest that those who like its philosophy vote for it; and in case, upon reflection, it appears that any loophole has been left in it, the matter can be corrected in conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I suggest the following amendment, to be added at the end of the amendment just adopted, proposed by the Senator from Maryland:

Provided, That Postal Savings depositories may deposit funds in member banks on time, under regulations to be prescribed by the Postmaster General.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator reduce his amendment to writing and send it to the desk, so that it may be stated?

Mr. McADOO. I will do so, Mr. President.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, while we are waiting for that to be done, if the Senator will permit me, I have an amendment already drawn which I should like to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland offers a further amendment, which will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. (a) Within 2 years after the enactment of this section every person, firm, association, business, trust, or other similar organization (which now operates on the basis of unlimited liability of its owners or members for all its obligations) engaged principally in the business of issuing, underwriting, selling, or distributing at wholesale, retail, or through syndicate participation stocks, bonds, debentures, notes, or other securities who is also engaged at the same time to any extent whatever in the business of receiving deposits subject to check, or to repayment upon presentation of a passbook, certificate of deposit, or other evidence of debt, or upon request of the depositor, shall elect as to whether or not the liability of such owners or members shall be limited as in the case of national banks to twice the capital invested in such business, or shall continue to operate with unlimited liability.

If the owners or members elect to limit their liability as aforesaid, they shall notify the Federal Reserve bank of the district in which such person, firm, association, business, trust, or other similar organization is located of such intention.

And in such event such notification shall be accompanied with a statement of the condition of said business, exhibiting in detail the reserves and liabilities, and such person, firm, association, business, trust, or other similar organization shall thereafter submit to periodical examination by the Comptroller of the Currency, or by the Federal Reserve bank of the district, and shall make and publish periodical reports of its condition, exhibiting in detail its reserves and liabilities; such examinations and reports to be made and published at the same time and in the same manner and with like effect and penalties as are now provided by law in respect of national banking associations transacting business in the same locality; or

(b) If any person, firm, association, business, trust, or other similar organization, shall determine to continue the unlimited liability of such individuals, partners, and associates with relation to deposits and other obligations of the organization, it shall be allowed to continue business as heretofore; provided, however, such person, firm, association, business, trust, or other similar organization shall submit semiannually to the Federal Reserve bank of its district, a certificate from a certified public accountant (satisfactory to such Federal Reserve bank) that said accountant has examined the affairs of said organization during the preceding semiannual period, and that in the opinion of said certified public accountant (based on examinations, values, and tests similar to those conducted by the Comptroller of the Currency) the business is in a sound financial condition.

And it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, association, business, trust, or other similar organization which has not complied with the above provision to engage in any extent whatever in the business of receiving deposits subject to check, or to repayment upon presentation of a passbook, certificate of deposit, or other evidence of debt, or upon request of the depositor.

Whoever shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both, and any officer, director, employee, or agent of any person, firm, association, business, trust or other similar organization who knowingly participates in any such violation shall be punished by a like fine or imprisonment, or both.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, this is rather a long amendment, but the section with which it deals is likewise a long section; and those who are in favor of the bill will realize that, for the most part, it is in the exact verbiage of the present bill.

Here is the situation with which the Senate must deal:

At present, private banking houses can receive deposits. After this bill is enacted into law they cannot receive deposits unless they conform to certain requirements set forth in the bill.

In my own State I have in mind one particular banking house. It is a private concern; a partnership. The depositors in that bank not only have the worth of the firm's assets behind every deposit, but they have everything that every partner is worth back of the assets of the partnership, and the deposits as well, with which to make good.

To the extent that we curtail that liability, we make these deposits unsafe. These men, under this new act, can still receive deposits. There is no question about that. We will not stop them from receiving deposits, but we will limit still further their liability to those depositors, as the bill is now drawn, over that which they would have to stand for in a partnership.

What I have attempted to do here is, using the same period of time set forth in the bill—namely, 2 years—that they shall decide whether they want to form a banking association which will limit their liability, and then be subjected to the examination of the Comptroller, or whether they may still give to these depositors the security not only of the assets of their firm but of every bit of property which each one of them is worth as well. My amendment simply makes that kind of a concern give a greater degree of security for deposits than the same concern will give under the terms of the bill.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COUZENS. I have been absent from the Chamber most of the day before the Banking and Currency Committee; and I was wondering whether this amendment requires any publicity with respect to the net worth of the partners.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes, Mr. President; it requires inspection by the Government. It requires that they shall periodically submit to the Government a statement of their assets and liabilities in great detail, just as national banks do. What I am trying to point out—and I think in the confusion of this late hour I probably shall not be able to make it plain, but I should like to do so—is that under the bill as drawn a partnership will incorporate, but under the bill as I have proposed to amend it the partnership need not incorporate. If it does incorporate, it will be liable only to the extent of its incorporation. If it does not incorporate, it will be liable for all the firm's assets and all of the assets of every partner as well. It does not change at all the basic proposition of examination of these private banks.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. BULKLEY. I should like to have it made clear whether what the Senator is proposing is by way of substitution for section 21 of the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. It is. I am only giving to the depositor in a private bank additional security for his deposit. Under the bill all the security he would have would be the corporate assets. Under this amendment he would have not only the corporate or firm assets but the property of every partner in the concern. Otherwise the bill is just the same. The supervision by the Government is there. The penalties for violation of the law are there as well. All that this amendment does is to make the partners of a private bank liable.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland further yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. In other words, the Senator wants to perpetuate the private-banking system.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; let me say that under this amendment the private bankers can still operate.

Mr. COUZENS. I mean the Senator wants to perpetuate the private bankers under regulation.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I am not interested in that. If they are to be perpetuated, however, then I want all the liability they have thrown in to protect the depositor instead of just a part of it.

Under this measure as now presented to the Senate the private banker is liable only to the extent of the corporate assets.

Mr. COUZENS. But after he incorporates, he is not a private banker any longer, is he?

Mr. TYDINGS. Why, of course he is. The stock could be held by 3 or 4 or 5 or 6 or 8 or 10 men who make up the firm.

Mr. COUZENS. He would not be a private banker any more after he became incorporated.

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly he would be. He could still incorporate under his own firm name.

Take the case of Morgan & Co. Morgan & Co. can come in under this bill and incorporate as J. P. Morgan. They can go ahead and divide up their stock among the 20 partners; and what will we have done? We will have limited the liability of that banking house to their corporate assets only, whereas we have the opportunity to extend the liability of those men not only to their corporate assets but to all the property which they own.

Mr. COUZENS. I appreciate the Senator's point of view; but I am still insisting that after J. P. Morgan & Co. incorporated, they would not be private bankers any more.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is a distinction which perhaps I did not understand when the Senator first made it. I am not interested in whether J. P. Morgan & Co. are private bankers or incorporated bankers. What I am attempting to bring to the attention of the Senate is that by the adoption of the provision as drawn, Morgan & Co., if it does incorporate, will escape a degree of responsibility to its people that it has no right to escape. What I want to do is to make every partner in Morgan & Co. responsible to the last dollar for any deposits the firm receives. Under this provision they will incorporate as J. P. Morgan & Co., and divide the stock between their 20 partners, and the stock they own will be the extent of their liability.

On the other hand, we can say that they can still operate as J. P. Morgan & Co., and in that case they will be liable to the assets of the last partners; but if they accept deposits then they must be under the supervision of the National Government.

That is all I am attempting to do. I hope I have made it clear.

I might say in passing that I doubt very much whether we have the authority, certainly within a State, to prohibit a private bank from accepting deposits. If I want to take $15 of my money and give it to some person for safe-keeping, he becomes a private banker, and I do not know what authority we have to prevent that; but I am not discussing that question here. What I am discussing is that if we are going to permit firms like Morgan & Co. to accept deposits, and the law is held good, we should not cut down their liability by allowing them to incorporate, but should keep all of the liability of that partnership, and then they will still be under the same supervision as they would be if they incorporated.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the substitution of this amendment for section 21 as drawn would materially change one of the most important principles in the bill. We have proposed to separate investment from commercial banking. Other sections of the bill bring to an end investment banking by commercial banks within a period of 2 years, as the bill was reported, and within a period of 1 year, pursuant to amendments which have been adopted on the floor today.

This amendment of the Senator from Maryland would strike out of the bill section 21, which prohibits—

Any person, firm, corporation, association, business, trust, or other similar organization, engaged principally in the business of issuing, underwriting, selling, or distributing * * * stocks, bonds, debentures, notes—

And so forth, from engaging—

At the same time to any extent whatever in the business of receiving deposits subject to check.

In other words, the bill as reported is an absolute prohibition against any organization, whether it be a corporation or an unlimited partnership, having as its principal business dealing in securities, from accepting any deposits whatever. It is vital to the principles of this bill that the amendment suggested should be defeated.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I am not going over the same ground I have already covered, but perhaps I look at this matter a little differently from the way some other Senators look at it, in this respect. We had better be careful, if national banks are to be prevented—and I am thoroughly in accord with that—from financing private businesses, as is required at times, on long-time paper, and if the same is to apply to all of the private investment houses of the better class, not the bucket shops, but those of integrity, those with clean methods, those with 100 years' tradition back of them, like Alexander Brown & Sons, over in my section of the country, which have financed many of the major projects of this Government, helped to finance the Government when it needed money, financed some of our largest railroads when they were being constructed, men of the highest caliber; if we are to cut all of that business away from the national banks—and I am in favor of it, as I have said—we had better watch out how far we go in destroying the usefulness of bona fide, finely run and conducted private institutions. We may want that credit some day, and we may fix it so that credit will not be available.

In passing, I want to leave this thought with the Senate, although I dislike to drag the constitutional provision in, because that argument is always made, but under what stretch of imagination, under what phase of constitutional law, under what concept of Supreme Court decision can the Congress of the United States say to a private banker in Baltimore or Nebraska that he may not accept the deposit of a citizen of his own State?

I want to admonish the Senate that in my humble judgment, for whatever it may be worth, this provision will soon be challenged in the Supreme Court of the United States if it is enacted into law, and instead of doing what we could do now, namely, cover these banks in under the supervision and examination of the Federal Government, we are going to have no control over them, in my humble judgment, because section 21 is going to be held unconstitutional. There is not the slightest color of authority to prevent a private bank over in Maryland from accepting deposits from a citizen in that State.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I am not a lawyer, and especially am I not a constitutional lawyer, but there is not only a substantial shadow of authority for this provision of the bill in law, and in constitutional law, but I will say to the Senator from Maryland that I have been supplied with a document, I would say without exaggeration at least an inch thick, which gave our committee opinion after opinion, of inferior, superior, supreme, Federal courts, in justification of the authority which we here try to assert. So much for the legal aspect of it.

As to the other suggestion, if we confine to their proper business activities these large private concerns whose principal business is that of dealing in investment securities, and so forth, and many of which unloaded millions of dollars of worthless investment securities upon the banks of this country, and deny them the right to conduct the deposit bank business at the same time, there will be no difficulty on the face of the globe in financing any business enterprise that needs to be financed at a profit in this country. Only the other day, in opening my remarks on this bank bill, I referred to the fact that, notwithstanding the protests which came to our Banking and Currency Committee, voicing the very thing now stated by the Senator from Maryland, the largest commercial bank in the world, I believe, the Chase National Bank, without waiting for the enactment of this bill, but very likely prompted by the knowledge that it would be enacted, separated itself from its affiliate, and the very next day the New York papers recorded the fact that those who were chiefly active in the conduct of the affairs of that affiliate were proposing to immediately set up and investment banking house to do the very things that affiliate had been unlawfully doing ever since its establishment.

If there is money in the business, there need be no fear but that large investment houses will be set up in this country, just as they have been in all of the countries of continental Europe, and in England, to be conducted by experienced bankers rather than by blacksmiths and speculators. There will be no difficulty on earth in meeting that issue, and I concur most heartily with my colleague the Senator from Ohio in saying that this is a vital provision of the bill, and that it should not be amended as suggested by the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] has proposed an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from California proposes the following amendment, to be inserted after the amendment adopted on page 50, line 3:

Provided, That Postal Savings depositories may deposit funds in member banks on time under regulations to be prescribed by the Postmaster General.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, responsive to the inquiry of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], to make sure that no existing State bank with a capitalization of as much as $25,000 may be precluded from becoming a member of the Federal Reserve banking system, and coming under the insurance of deposits provision of the bill, I propose, on page 59, at the end of line 7, to insert this proviso, which was prepared by the drafting bureau of the Senate:

Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to State banks and trust companies organized prior to the date this paragraph as amended takes effect and having a capital of not less than $25,000.

I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 67, lines 11 and 12, to strike out the word "principally", so as to read:

(1) For any person, firm, corporation, association, business, trust, or other similar organization engaged in the business of issuing, underwriting, selling, or distributing, at wholesale or retail, or through syndicate participation, stocks, bonds, debentures, notes, or other securities, to engage at the same time to any extent whatever in the business of receiving deposits subject to check or to repayment upon presentation of a passbook, certificate of deposit, or other evidence of debt, or upon request of the depositor; or.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, this amendment relates to the same section we have been discussing. It has become apparent that at least some of the great investment houses are engaged in so many forms of business that there is some doubt as to whether the investment business is the principal one. Therefore this word must be eliminated in order to make sure that we will accomplish a separation of the investment and deposit banking.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. Beginning with line 18, on page 46, the Senator from North Dakota moves to strike out all down to and including line 7 on page 47.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the Senate committee amendment, which would be stricken from the bill, is one relating to section 13 of the Federal Reserve Act, which grants certain powers and rights to certain banks affiliated with the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I understand it, the Senator's amendment simply undertakes to strike out an amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. NYE. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. I submit that the only way for the Senator to accomplish that would be to persuade the Senate to vote against the adoption of the committee amendment.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I understand that all the committee amendments have been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the clerk that the committee amendment to which the Senator has reference has already been agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it would be out of order, of course, to move to strike out an amendment already agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will make a point of order, the Chair will sustain it.

Mr. NYE. Then I move, Mr. President, to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

Mr. NYE. I will say to the Senator that the purpose of my amendment is merely to restore to the banks affiliated with the Federal Reserve System the right they now have, which they would lose under the committee amendment, to write fire insurance and other insurance.

Mr. GLASS. I may say to the Senator that the committee had a tremendous amount of correspondence on the subject of prohibiting national banks from engaging in the insurance business, and this section of the bill prohibits them from engaging in the insurance business.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, has consent been given to reconsider the action adopting the committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is pending a motion to reconsider, but it has not been put. Does the Senator desire the motion put?

Mr. NYE. I desire it put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota moves to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. BULKLEY. I offer an amendment to correct a typographical error in the bill that has been called to my attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 31, line 23, it is proposed to strike out the figures "5158" and to insert "5138."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I should like to address a brief question, if I may, to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I refer to page 80, section 31. There seems to be a difference of opinion between certain attorneys in relation to the punctuation of that section, and they suggest that on line 15 the semicolon should be changed to a comma, and on line 19 the comma should be changed to a semicolon, for the reason that the clause in lines 19 and 20, without that change, apparently would only refer to the part of the section beginning in line 15 and not to the first part of the section. It is a small matter, and I think it has been explained to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I may say to the Senator that I have no objection to the alteration suggested, except, in my judgment, it is a bad alteration. People differ as to punctuation, and I think the punctuation as now revealed in the bill is the correct punctuation. I never heard of a comma being before a conjunction in a well-ordered writing, but I have heard of a semicolon being there.

Mr. BARBOUR. Would the Senator say, then, that the clause I mentioned which reads "unless in any such case there is a permit therefor issued by the Federal Reserve Board;" refers not only up to line 15 but on up to the beginning of the section? If the Senator does, I am perfectly willing to let the matter drop.

Mr. GLASS. I am perfectly willing to alter the punctuation as suggested by the Senator. I do not think it is material, one way or the other.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, it seems to me it makes quite a difference in the meaning of the section.

Mr. GLASS. In what respect?

Mr. BULKLEY. In line 19 there is a provision for a permit, and if the semicolon remains in line 15 it will probably be interpreted that the provision with respect to the permit should only go back so far as the clause beginning in line 15. With the change suggested by the Senator from New Jersey, the permit might be issued to cover the matter which is prohibited in the provision from lines 8 to 15 of the section.

Mr. BARBOUR. That is exactly the point I want to bring out. I thought that it was intended it should be applied to the whole section.

Mr. BULKLEY. I do not so understand it; and I did not want the Senator from Virginia to be under the misapprehension that it does not change the meaning.

Mr. BARBOUR. Neither do I.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think it does with the assurances given.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Senator from New Jersey suggests a modification so that the meaning shall be changed.

Mr. GLASS. I do not want to change the meaning, do you?

Mr. BULKLEY. I have thought that the paragraph was correctly punctuated as it is.

Mr. GLASS. I think it is now correctly punctuated, and I hope the Senator will not insist upon his amendment. When we get into conference if anybody wants to change the punctuation point there will be no trouble about doing it.

Mr. BULKLEY. Unless the House language in this respect is not changed.

Mr. GLASS. The House bill does not contain that provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments?

Mr. KEYES. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 79, line 17, after the words "or other member of", it is proposed to strike out "such governing body" and insert "the governing body of a national banking association, State bank, or trust company, which has a paid-in and unimpaired capital in excess of $50,000."

Mr. KEYES. Mr. President, I am prompted to offer that amendment—

Mr. GLASS. I have no objection, at all, to the amendment.

Mr. KEYES. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I suppose this is the point at which I should ask the Chair to lay before the Senate House bill 5661, in order that I may move that the Senate proceed to its consideration and then substitute the Senate bill for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the bill (H.R. 5661) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of banks, to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GLASS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider House bill 5661.

Mr. GLASS. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the House bill and to insert the Senate bill as agreed to today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I wish to be heard for a few moments before the bill is finally passed, if it is going to be, and I assume that it will be.

Mr. President, with certain features of this measure I am in accord; I believe that for the most part it has a great deal of merit and will commend itself to the consideration of the Members of the Senate; but I cannot see my way clear to support that provision of the bill which would guarantee bank deposits. My investigation of that subject leads me to the conclusion that wherever that has been tried it has been a failure.

I find there have been guaranty deposit laws in eight States. The first of those was enacted in the State of Oklahoma in 1908. It continued to operate until 1922, and when it was repealed there was a deficit; in other words, there were bank deposits lost to the depositors in the sum of $3,350,000 which were never repaid.

The next State to enact such a law was the State of Nebraska. That law was enacted in 1911 and repealed in 1930. At the time of its repeal there were unpaid deposits in failed banks aggregating somewhere in the neighborhood of $20,000,000.

Next came the State of Mississippi, which enacted a guaranty deposit law in 1915. That law was repealed in 1930, with a deficit at that time of $1,941,000.

Then in 1916 the State of South Dakota enacted a guaranty deposit law, which was repealed in 1930. At that time there was a deficit of $36,769,000, which was never paid to the depositors.

Next came North Dakota, which enacted a deposit guaranty law in 1917 and repealed it in 1929, with a deficit of $12,000,000.

Then Kansas in 1909 enacted such a law which continued in force for some 20 years, although that law was voluntary in its operation. It was repealed in 1929, leaving a deficit of $15,000,000.

Texas enacted such a law in 1910, which was repealed in 1927, leaving a deficit of $1,400,000.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEBERT. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator makes reference to the operation of the guaranty deposit law in Texas. It is true that my State abandoned the system, but it was not a failure in the sense that there were losses. Only recently I read that quite a large sum of money, running into more than a million dollars in that fund, was redistributed and paid back to the banks which had originally contributed to the fund. It was not a failure, in that the banks suffered any great losses. It is true that the banks paid in from time to time assessments, and a fund was accumulated, and, of course, there were losses out of that fund because of the payment of guaranteed deposits in banks which had failed; but I do not think the Senator can justly say that there was any substantial loss so far as the total operations of the system were concerned.

Of course, there will be losses whenever any bank fails; there will be losses under this bill if we consider the moneys which will be paid out in guaranteeing deposits; but in my State I do not think it can be said that the system was a failure. The State simply changed its policy and abandoned the system because there was so much pressure from the banks that had been contributing money and had never failed and had gotten no compensatory benefit from the law.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, let me read, for the information of the Senate, from the report of a careful investigation of the operation of the law in Texas. Under the head of Bank Failures Under the Guaranty, this report goes on to say this:

However, in the 6-year period, 1920-25, about 150 guaranty-fund banks failed. Of these, 52 were reorganized without loss to the fund. Under the Texas plan no certificates were issued to the depositors, but when a bank was taken over by the banking department and liquidation begun, depositors were paid until its available cash was exhausted, then the guaranty fund was drawn upon, and as it became depleted assessments were collected from the banks up to 2 percent in a year of their average daily deposits. By this process about $19,000,000 was pumped out of member banks in 1920-25; final liquidation of the closed banks returned about $4,000,000 to them, leaving their net losses at $15,000,000.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield further to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEBERT. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. What the Senator from Rhode Island has read may be true, but the point I wish to make is that every depositor in a closed bank was paid; he got his deposit back. Of course, the money had to come from the other banks, and there were losses in that way.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, so much for the record in those States where a guaranty deposit law has been in force.

I wish now to quote from the same report to which I have already referred, the Lessons of Experience, as follows:

These lessons of experience appear to demonstrate conclusively that in practice the guaranty-of-deposits plan generally tended to induce an unsound expansion in the number of banks and the volume of bank deposits under its supposed protection. This was clearly connected with the indiscriminate popular confidence created toward the banks under the guaranty. Unneeded, undersized, and unsound banks, as well as unqualified bank operators, were enabled to command public patronage because of the belief that the banks in the State system were guaranteed by the State and therefore the depositor could not lose.

The rate of bank failures was greater among guaranteed banks than among nonguaranteed banks doing business side by side with them. This produced a higher rate of loss than the guaranty funds, set up by assessments against member banks, were calculated to meet and resulted in the insolvency of the funds, their financial break-downs and larger deficits in unpayable claims in the hands of disappointed depositors.

The report goes on further to say:

The causes of insecurity of bank deposits are found for the most part in economic conditions and banking practices that can be identified. The logical procedure is to aim at prevention of these causes so far as possible and at fortifying the banks by good banking against adverse circumstances so as to avoid failures.

Mr. President, I am justly proud of the fact that in the State which I have the honor in part to represent there has not been a single bank failure during the entire depression. That may be due to many causes, but I venture the assertion that the basic cause is good management and good banking. I cannot believe that it is due altogether to careful supervision. I have known something about State supervision of financial institutions, the supervision of various classes of institutions by the State government, and I know from my experience that the well-being of those institutions has been due more especially to the character of the management behind them than to the supervision to which they have been subjected.

I can see no merit in the proposal to provide this guaranty for bank deposits. On the other hand, to my mind it is going to penalize the well-managed banks to take care of those where there is careless management, and surely that cannot be justified by any argument.

I repeat, in the main I am not opposed to the bank bill. I would vote for the remaining provisions of it were it not for the inclusion within it of the provision for a guaranty of bank deposits. I felt I should make this statement in explanation of my attitude toward the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to substitute the text of the Senate bill for the text of the House bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, ask for a conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. GLASS, Mr. BULKLEY, Mr. McADOO, Mr. WALCOTT, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. I move that Senate bill 1631 be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE INVESTIGATIONS—ADDRESS BY SENATOR NYE

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on the 23d day of May there was delivered a short radio address by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] upon the subject of "Legislative Investigations." I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The sponsors of this program are undertaking to carry to the radio audience of America knowledge concerning the relationship between you and your Government on the subject of "Legislative Investigations." I am sure that Professor Rogers, with whom I share place on this program tonight, rather easily enters upon this task with a contribution that is truly educational. He has been permitted to stand back and view broadly the merits of investigations. As for myself, I at moments doubt my ability to discuss the subject from an educational standpoint. I fear I have been too close to many of these investigations to permit an unprejudiced view. During my 8 years in the Senate I have participated in more investigations than one can possibly desire, if it can be said that one could desire a hand in any one investigation. My experience has given me two prejudices. One is that occasioned by the responsibility which accompanies the conduct of an investigation. The other prejudice is caused by my deep conviction that legislative investigations are essential, important, and highly productive of results beneficial to the people of the United States and to the perpetuity of whatever may now remain of a government of, by, and for the people. I shall strive, however, to prevent these prejudices standing in the way of my making some little contribution to the splendid purpose of the Council on Radio in Education.

There is wide belief that members of legislative bodies seek and welcome assignment to investigating committees and that they move for investigations only because they afford opportunity for personal publicity. But I have yet to meet the Member of Congress who has enjoyed the tremendous responsibility accompanying appointment to such a committee. The public can have only a faint notion of the labor, grief, and personal sacrifice assumed by those who draw these investigation responsibilities. The conduct of an investigation involves the necessity of most serious decisions, decisions which might easily be so unfair as to gravely injure innocent parties.

I might, were the time available, picture some of the trials which fall upon a committee and show how difficult it is to choose paths that are fair without inviting bitter criticism from those who by the thousands offer suggestions, tips, and demands concerning the manner in which the investigation should be conducted. There is little balm or glory for those who find themselves charged with the duty of conducting a legislative investigation. If there is any satisfaction for legislators thus charged it lies only in the final accomplishment of facts in the face of a world of obstacles. Men accept service upon these committees quite alone because they see a worthy purpose to be served by the investigations and because someone must serve upon them if the whole duty of a legislative body is to be done. So I say that it is most unfair to charge that legislative investigations are for the purpose of affording glory or publicity for legislators. There are many easier ways of winning that publicity.

Are legislative investigations costly, wasteful, and productive of no worthy return or results, as is so often charged? I insist that on the whole they are anything but that. I expect there is some waste of the moneys made available for the conduct of investigations, just as there is waste in courts and in industry generally, but the waste is not wanton. No matter how much waste may be involved I am sure it can be easily demonstrated that the actual dollar-and-cents gains resulting from investigations easily outweigh the costs.

Investigations have become a most important duty of legislative bodies under our form of government. Through no other method would it have been possible to accomplish ends so worth while as were won in the Daugherty, the Teapot Dome, the Continental Trading Co. investigations, in the campaigns investigations, in the securities and banking investigations, and in other investigations with which listeners are acquainted. Will the cost of these investigations, which did not amount to as much as a million dollars, be a thing to stand out in importance above the information gained through them, the penalties inflicted upon wrongdoers, and the prevention of the purchase of places in legislative halls? I am sure none, knowing the facts, would permit such a choice and view to long exist in their own minds.

The argument in support of investigations should not be placed upon a mercenary ground. Investigations are essentially a function of the legislative arm of the Government and its cost is part and parcel of the cost of legislative action. One might as well argue that it is a waste of money to retain a democratic form of government and that great savings could be made by the dismissal of Congress from any part in our Government. But if there be desire to weigh the cost in the consideration of the merit of investigations, let us briefly consider the subject from that wholly mercenary standpoint.

It was not long ago that a leading figure in American political life protested strongly against the wastefulness of investigations. He pointed out that in the past 16 or 20 years the Senate had spent $1,383,000 for investigations. He was a man of honest convictions and his demand for economies of this kind thoroughly sincere. His failing in this case was his blindness to the actual dollars recovered and paid into the United States Treasury by men who and corporations which the investigations revealed were cheating the Government. One investigation which I shall recite brought into the Federal Treasury many times the amount that was expended in the conduct of it. I refer to the Continental Trading Co. investigation, an aftermath of the Teapot Dome study. It was my lot to be chairman of the committee in question and to work with the late Senator Thomas Walsh, of Montana, in prosecuting that investigation, which involved the transactions and shady profits of the oil men—Sinclair, Stewart, O'Neil, and Blackmer. As a result of that one investigation the United States Treasury has successfully prosecuted actions to cause the payment of taxes evaded by these men and others in the amount of $7,027,689.09. Further actions within the last year may have materially increased that total. The cost of the investigation was approximately $30,000. It seems to me that the sums spent in prosecution of that investigation represent a reasonably fair investment from the standpoint of the Government. Consider with this the millions of dollars that were recovered by the Government as well as the vast and valuable resources worth hundreds of millions returned to the Government as a result of the naval oil lease investigations, and there must be agreement that these two investigations have been sufficiently profitable to pay for all the investigations conducted by the Houses of Congress during our lifetime as a nation.

So much for the cost end of any argument concerning the value of legislative investigations. What are the more material returns, if any? I answer they are many.

Who would have Harry M. Daugherty, formerly Attorney General of the United States, still enjoying the confidence of the people, as he would be doing but for a legislative investigation fearlessly prosecuted?

Who is there who wishes that Albert B. Fall, former Secretary of the Interior, was still in a commanding and influential position and exercising a voice in our democracy, as he would be doing but for the searching rays of an investigation played upon him and his betrayal of his trust?

Who is there desiring that Samuel Insull might continue to wield that influence which enabled him to lose the fortunes and savings of thousands of trusting investors; and who of all Americans would have the facts concerning Halsey Stewart & Co., as revealed by investigation, covered up so that the public might never have reason to know that this great firm participated in practices intended to defraud those who looked to it as an adviser?

Who would put back in important and responsible posts where they would enjoy continued public confidence bankers like Harri-man and Mitchell, who betrayed public confidence and contributed, they and their kind, to the terrible economic downfall which has brought such suffering to America as exists today?

Who would have legislative bodies, presumed to be representative, close their eyes to corrupt practices resorted to in winning election to those legislative bodies rather than insist, as those legislative bodies have, upon careful watching of the conduct of these election campaigns?

Who is there with such wishes and desires? Answer that and you name the men or the interests which would, if they could, turn every wheel of the peoples' Government into a piece of machinery to function for their own selfish interests and to the continued looting of the American people.

Out of practically every investigation there comes legislation improving the security of the Government and the people against selfishness and greed. It is often said that the same results could be obtained through regular prosecution in the courts of the land. Such a conclusion is not mindful of the fact that there can be no prosecution without facts. It ought also be said that a legislative investigation has access to facts which courts cannot hope to gain under the rules of evidence which prevail. A legislative investigation can ask and require answers to questions which the rules of courts would not countenance. Without prejudice, but with that power, the legislator can gain knowledge upon which to base legislation and conclusions which contribute to the safeguarding of government and people.

Investigations serve a most healthy purpose in that they prevent many practices and serve as a caution against practices which might be considered proper and customary but for the development of a conscience by the existence of an investigating committee. In these days of overgrown corporations when the rule is "get all you can while the getting is good", occasional strokes by an investigating committee serve a splendid purpose.

In 1872 Judge Poland, of Vermont, chairman of a special committee of Congress appointed to investigate charges of corruption, said in his report:

"This country is fast becoming filled with gigantic corporations wielding and controlling immense aggregations of money and thereby commanding great influence and power."

Forty years later Woodrow Wilson said:

"We have come to be one of the worst ruled, one of the most completely controlled and dominated governments in the civilized world—no longer a government by conviction and the vote of the majority, but a government by the opinion and duress of small groups of dominant men. The Government of the United States at present is a foster child of the special interests. Our Government has been for the last few years under the control of the heads of great allied corporations with special interests. It is not allowed to have a will of its own. The trusts are our masters now."

With economic and political influence coming into such concentrated control it is of greatest importance that legislative bodies be on closest guard against encroachment which further threatens a free government. Honest investigations, prosecuted by legislators determined to reach and develop the facts, and by legislators who in their work can and will abandon partisanship, are of greatest value to the Government and its people. They afford necessary knowledge basic to helpful legislation. They educate people to practices unfriendly to their best interests. They throw fear into men and interests who would by any means at their command move governments to selfish purposes. They command respect for government and for law. They tend to make government cleaner and more responsive to public needs and interests. We should have not less, but more legislative investigations.

EMERGENCY RELIEF OF RAILROADS

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1580) to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I intend to offer to the railroad bill and ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ABOLITION OF BOARD OF INDIAN COMMISSIONERS (H.DOC. NO. 57)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying Executive order, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, as follows:

To the Congress:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 1, title III, of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, I am transmitting herewith an Executive order abolishing the Board of Indian Commissioners.

There is no necessity for the continuance of this Board, and its abolition will be in the interests of economy.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 25, 1933.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H.R. 5390) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, and it was signed by the Vice President.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. KENDRICK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there is a contest over a nominee on the calendar; and on account of the lateness of the hour I suggest to the eminent Senator from Wyoming that we recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, does the Senator from Oregon object to an executive session?

Mr. McNARY. We were engaged a few days ago in a contest which will carry us now until a later hour. Inasmuch as it is nearly half past 5 now—

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator would have no objection to having the Chair lay down a message from the President which relates to certain nominations? That is the only object of the executive session, as I understand.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, there is also a question of notification of the President of the confirmation of Mr. Ewin Lamar Davis as Federal Trade Commissioner. The nomination was confirmed the other day, and we are anxious that the President may be notified.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection to an executive session if we can get through with it promptly; but I do not want to stay beyond this late hour with the contest still brewing that we had here last week.

Mr. KENDRICK. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of John Walter Doyle, of Honolulu, Hawaii, to be collector of customs for customs collection district no. 32, with headquarters at Honolulu, Hawaii.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, reported favorably the nomination of Arthur E. Morgan, of Ohio, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations will be placed on the calendar.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSIONER—NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, at one of the recent executive sessions Mr. Ewin Lamar Davis was confirmed for Federal Trade Commissioner.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of the nomination.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, do I understand that he was confirmed at an executive session several days ago?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and the request now is to notify the President.

Mr. McNARY. How many executive sessions have intervened?

Mr. McKELLAR. One only.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Calendar is in order.

The legislative clerk announced Executive C. (72d Cong., 2d sess.), a treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada for the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway, signed on July 18, 1932, as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The treaty will be passed over.

THE ADJUTANT GENERAL

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James Fuller McKinley to be The Adjutant General in the Army.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I am compelled to be away tomorrow afternoon, and also Saturday. While I shall not vote for the confirmation of General McKinley, and I do not want to pursue any tactics which are purely dilatory or blocking, yet unless the nomination can be disposed of this afternoon I should like very much not to have it considered while I am away.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, inasmuch as we were only in the midst of the consideration of this nomination last week, on account of the lateness of the hour now I should not want it to be considered at this time unless we can act upon it immediately.

Mr. TYDINGS. I ask that it go over until Monday.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, is it understood that notification of the President of the confirmation of the nomination of General Conley is to be withheld until the McKinley nomination is disposed of?

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate vote on the McKinley nomination on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the Senate vote on the McKinley nomination on Monday next. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not want to interfere with my friend from Tennessee, but I hope he will withdraw the request.

Mr. McKELLAR. We have had the nomination up several times.

Mr. LONG. The matter is going to require considerable discussion. I myself expect to speak at length on the nomination, and I know that others intend to do likewise. I shall have to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana objects.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, there was some confusion in the Chamber. I did not understand whether the Chair said the nomination of General Conley is to be held here until the McKinley nomination is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that a unanimous-consent agreement to that effect was entered into at a previous executive session.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Chair stated that a unanimous-consent agreement had been entered into with reference to the Conley nomination. I think that was slightly in error. My recollection is that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] moved that the nomination of General Conley be held up until the McKinley nomination could be disposed of, and I did not object to it.

Mr. BULKLEY. My recollection is it was a unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that an order was entered to that effect. In any event, it has the same effect.

Mr. McNARY. The Chair has been properly advised on that subject. That is correct.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Stephen B. Gibbons, of New York, to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, let that go over until the next executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be passed over.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. KENDRICK. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, May 26, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MAY 25, 1933

The House met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Thou, who art the Creator and the Master of all life, we pause this moment at the altar of prayer and breathe the holy word—not unto us, not unto us, O Lord, but unto Thy excellent name be honor and glory, dominion and power, both now and ever. Here we wait in thanksgiving for the renewal of our strength. Gratefully mindful that we are Thine, do Thou put sacredness of duty upon all hearts, that we may ever frown upon all neglect as unworthy of our high calling. O free us from every fear save that of doing wrong. Be Thou that wise presence diffused in all our actions. By faith, love, and energy may we make our way toward the stature of the perfect man. Calm us when vexations distract and rebuke us, when scanty thoughts turn us from Thy matchless grace. We praise Thee that Thou art our God forever and ever and will be our guide even unto death. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate, having tried Harold Louderback, judge of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, upon five several articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, and two thirds of the Senators present not having found him guilty of the charges contained therein: It is therefore Ordered and adjudged, That the said Harold Louderback be, and he is, acquitted of all the charges in said articles made and set forth.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate nos. 2 and 14 to the bill (H.R. 5390) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

ACCEPTANCE AND TRANSFER OF CERTAIN LANDS IN SAN DIEGO, CALIF.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H.R. 1767) to authorize the acceptance of certain lands in the city of San Diego, Calif., by the United States, and the transfer by the Secretary of the Navy of certain other lands to said city of San Diego.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized on behalf of the United States to accept from the city of San Diego, Calif., when said city has been duly authorized to make such transfer by the State of California, free from all encumbrances and without cost to the United States, all right, title, and interest in and to the lands contained within the following-described area: Beginning at the intersection of the prolongation of the northwesterly line of Bean Street with the United States bulkhead line as established in February 1912; thence southwesterly along the prolongation of the northwesterly line of Bean Street to the pierhead line as the same has been or may hereafter be established by the United States; thence, northwesterly and southwesterly along the said pierhead line to its intersection with the prolongation of the northeasterly line of Lowell Street; thence northwesterly along the prolongation of the northeasterly line of Lowell Street to the United States bulkhead line as established in February 1912; thence northeasterly, easterly, and southeasterly along the United States bulkhead line as established in February 1912, to the point of beginning containing approximately 242 acres; and also, all of block 16, municipal tide lands subdivision, tract no. 1; said lands being desired by the Navy Department for national defense and for use in connection with existing naval activities at San Diego, Calif.

The said Secretary of the Navy is also authorized hereby to transfer to the city of San Diego, Calif., free from all encumbrances and without cost to said city of San Diego, all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the lands contained within that part of the Marine Corps base, San Diego, Calif., described as follows: Beginning at a point on the United States bulkhead line as established in February 1912, distant 300 feet northwesterly from station no. 104 on said bulkhead line; thence north 7° east a distance of 2,160 feet; thence north 60°34'59" west to an intersection with the prolongation of the northwesterly line of Bean Street; thence southwesterly along the prolongation of the northwesterly line of Bean Street to an intersection with the United States bulkhead line, as established in February 1912; thence south 83° east along said bulkhead line to the point of beginning, containing approximately 67 acres.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMERICAN-GROWN APPLES AND PEARS IN FOREIGN MARKETS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H.R. 4812) to promote the foreign trade of the United States in apples and/or pears, to protect the reputation of American-grown apples and pears in foreign markets, to prevent deception or misrepresentation as to the quality of such products moving in foreign commerce, to provide for the commercial inspection of such products entering such commerce, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I objected the other day, but since then I have ascertained that the majority leader is strongly in favor of this measure and seems to think that it is an emergency matter, and ought to be passed. I want to be assured of one fact, however, and that is that there is no junket of any kind in this bill anywhere in the United States or in any foreign country. I intend to try to stop all junkets of every kind.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I can absolutely assure the gentleman of that.

The purpose of the bill is to promote the export of American apples and pears. During recent years the average export of pears was 1,650,584 bushels, and of apples 2,593,466 barrels and 8,937,149 boxes. During the past 2 years some 26 nations have imposed restrictions of one kind or another on American apples and pears by specifying the qualities which may be imported during certain periods, increasing the rigidity of sanitary requirements and inspection, and through increased import duties. Those interested in this large export business desire to have these restrictions discussed at the Economic Conference to be held in London next month, and to place our Department of State in position to assure foreign nations that nothing except standard grades of fruit will hereafter be shipped. This bill was prepared by the International Apple Association, composed of the leading shippers, shippers' organizations, outstanding growers and exporters from coast to coast, and by the Eastern Apple Growers Council, a federation of 19 State horticultural societies east of the Missouri River.

It provides for an inspection of export apples and pears by the Department of Agriculture and requires that every shipment shall be accompanied by a certificate issued under authority of the Secretary of Agriculture showing that such apples and pears meet the requirements of the established United States grades or the requirements of the country to which shipped. The bill will not require an appropriation. Under section 5 of the bill, the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause to be collected a reasonable fee for inspecting and certifying the grade, quality, condition, and so forth, of the fruit shipped provided additional personnel should be required of the Department in carrying out the provisions of the bill. This fee, however, shall not in any event exceed the cost of the service rendered.

The Secretary of Agriculture in reporting on the bill—which has his hearty approval—stated:

It is believed that the bill as drawn presents no serious administrative difficulties, and that its enactment will have a wholesome influence on our export trade in apples and pears.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person to ship or offer for shipment or for any common carrier to transport or receive for transportation to any foreign destination, except as provided in this act, any apples and/or pears in closed packages which are not accompanied by a certificate issued under authority of the Secretary of Agriculture showing that such apples or pears meet the requirements of that one of such United States grades as have been or may be established by the Secretary or State grades which may be designated by the Secretary as specifying the minimum quality of such fruits which may be shipped in export. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe, by regulations, the requirements, other than those of grade, which the fruit must meet before certificates are issued. No clearance shall be given to any vessel having on board any apples or pears which are not covered by a certificate complying with the provisions of this act.

Sec. 2. The Secretary shall give reasonable notice through one or more trade papers of the effective date of standards of export established or designated by him under this act: Provided, That any apples or pears may be certified and shipped for export in fulfillment of any contract made within 6 months prior to the date of such shipment if the terms of such contract were in accordance with the grades and regulations of the Secretary in effect at the time the contract was made.

Sec. 3. Where the government of the country to which the shipment is to be made has standards or requirements as to condition of apples or pears the Secretary may in addition to inspection and certification for compliance with the standards established or designated hereunder inspect and certify for determination as to compliance with the standards or requirements of such foreign government and may provide for special certificates in such cases.

Sec. 4. Apples or pears shipped in less than carload lots, as defined by the Secretary, may be shipped to countries in the Western Hemisphere without complying with the provisions of this act.

Sec. 5. For inspecting and certifying the grade, quality, and/or condition of apples and/or pears the Secretary shall cause to be collected a reasonable fee which shall as nearly as may be cover the cost of the service rendered: Provided, That when cooperative arrangements satisfactory to the Secretary, or his designated representative, for carrying out the purposes of this act cannot be made the fees collected hereunder in such cases shall be available until expended to defray the cost of the service rendered, and in such cases the limitations on the amounts expended for the purchase and maintenance of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles shall not be applicable: Provided further, That certificates issued by the authorized agents of the United States Department of Agriculture shall be received in all courts of the United States as prima facie evidence of the truth of the statements therein contained.

Sec. 6. After opportunity for hearing the Secretary is authorized to refuse the issuance of certificates under this act for periods not exceeding 90 days to any person who ships or offers for shipment any apples and/or pears in foreign commerce in violation of any of the provisions of this act. Any person or any common carrier or any transportation agency violating any of the provisions of this act shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $10,000 by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 7. The Secretary may make such rules, regulations, and orders as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, and may cooperate with any department or agency of the Government, any State, Territory, District, or possession, or department, agency, or political subdivision thereof, or any person, whether operating in one or more jurisdictions; and shall have the power to appoint, remove, and fix the compensation of such officers and employees not in conflict with existing law, and make such expenditures for rent outside the District of Columbia, printing, binding, telegrams, telephones, law books, books of reference, publications, furniture, stationery, office equipment, travel, and other supplies and expenses including reporting services, as shall be necessary to the administration of this act in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and as may be appropriated for by Congress; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary for such purpose. This act shall not abrogate nor nullify any other statute, whether State or Federal, dealing with the same subjects as this act; but it is intended that all such statutes shall remain in full force and effect except insofar as they are inconsistent herewith or repugnant hereto.

Sec. 8. If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and of the application of such provision to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Sec. 9. That when used in this act—

(1) The term "person" includes individuals, partnerships, corporations, and associations.

(2) The term "Secretary of Agriculture" means the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States.

(3) Except as provided herein, the term "foreign commerce" means commerce between any State, or the District of Columbia, and any place outside of the United States or its possessions.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "closed" before the word "packages."

Page 2, line 3, after the first three words "apples or pears", strike out the balance of line 3, all of lines 4, 5, 6, and through the word "export" in line 7 and substitute the following: "are of a Federal or State grade which meets the minimum of quality established by the Secretary for shipment in export."

Page 2, line 12, after the word "issued", insert the following new sentence: "The Secretary shall provide opportunity, by public hearing or otherwise, for interested persons to examine and make recommendation with respect to any standard of export proposed to be established or designated, or regulation prescribed, by the Secretary for the purpose of this act."

Page 3, lines 13 to 16, strike out section 4 and substitute the following:

"Apples or pears in less than carload lots as defined by the Secretary may, in his discretion, be shipped to any foreign country without complying with the provisions of this act."

Page 4, line 17, after the word "agency", insert the word "knowingly."

Page 5, line 12, after the word "Congress", strike out the balance of line 12, all of lines 13 and 14, and the word "purpose" in line 15.

Page 6, line 10, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"(4) The term 'apples and/or pears' means fresh whole apples or pears whether or not they have been in storage."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed. A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE PRICE OF CEMENT

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, within recent weeks there has occurred a renewed discussion of cement prices, which appears to have had its inception in a request made by the Secretary of the Interior that the Federal Trade Commission investigate cement bids for Illinois highway work.

In some quarters these discussions have led to the criticism that present cement prices are unduly high. It is to this criticism that I wish to address myself; first, on the ground that I believe such criticism unjust and uncalled for, and second, because I have the honor to represent a district in eastern Pennsylvania in which cement is one of the chief articles of production.

In eastern Pennsylvania alone the cement industry represents a capital investment of more than $120,000,000. In normal times it produced more than 40,000,000 barrels of cement, employed about 10,000 wage earners, purchased annually more than $40,000,000 in materials, and paid out approximately $16,000,000 in salaries and wages.

There is no necessity for me to recite the situation of cement workers and manufacturers in eastern Pennsylvania at present, except to say that they have felt the depression as severely as any class in the country.

I am cognizant of the difficulties against which these companies have been struggling for several years, not only against the depression but because of a disastrous 2-year price war which brought selling prices to the lowest point in more than 16 years.

To make the conditions worse, the cement companies in eastern Pennsylvania, and, in fact, all companies on both coasts which ship into seaboard areas, have been harassed by foreign competition which has at times demoralized coastal markets, especially where the importer had the advantage of depreciated currencies.

The best answer to the criticism that the price of cement is unreasonable or even high enough to pay more than production costs lies in the fact that every cement company in the country which publishes figures showed heavy losses for the year 1932, the loss ranging up to $2,000,000 for a single company.

It is precisely because of a comparison of present prices with those quoted at the height of the price war that the cement industry is under criticism today. In Illinois, for example, the price bid this year, including freight, averages $1.62. This may seem high in comparison with the $0.94 paid last year, when the price war was at its height, but it is lower than the State paid for cement prior to the price war and lower in fact than the State paid for cement in any of the 14 years it has bought cement except for the years 1931 and 1932, which were price-war years.

Governor Horner, of Illinois, has published the following figures, which bear out this contention:

	Per bbl.
1919-----	$2.04
1920-----	2.03
1921-----	2.04
1922-----	1.86
1923-----	2.06
1924-----	2.15
1925-----	2.15
1926-----	2.15
1927-----	2.20
1928-----	2.00
1929-----	1.98
1930-----	1.78
1931-----	1.29
1932-----	.94
1933 (bid price)-----	1.62
• • • • •
Average, 1919-32, including price-war years of 1931 and 1932-----	$1.90
Average, 1919-30, excluding price-war years-----	2.04
Price bid 1933-----	1.62

As to the reasonableness of present prices, I am reliably informed by cement manufacturers that present prices will not cover costs and that they will lose money at present levels.

The meaning of these losses is clear to us all. They mean continued dearth of taxes to the Government, continued loss of dividends and interest, continued unemployment, continued reductions in salaries and wages, and a continued postponement of prosperity.

Another point upon which the cement industry has sometimes come in for criticism is the fact that at certain times and places its prices are uniform. Certain of my friends in the cement industry have consulted with me on this subject of uniform prices and they believe, and I believe, that the time has arrived to place on the public records an explanation of price uniformity in the cement industry, which that industry insists is not only justified but necessary in the conduct of its business.

The cement industry does not refer me to uniform price arguments in tobacco, in bread, in milk, in gasoline, or in many other basic industries, as a reason for its own selling methods, even though these are entirely pertinent. The cement industry, on the other hand, is ready, even insistent, on standing on its own feet and in proving that uniformity of prices promotes competition rather than stifles it.

When this very question was before the courts an eminent authority, Dr. Thomas S. Adams, professor of political economy at Yale University, stated:

There is for all practical purposes a unanimity of opinion among economists that with a standardized commodity and conditions of effective competition there is the strongest tendency to uniform prices.

Later in this same case, in which uniformity and collusion in the making of prices were charged against the cement industry, the Supreme Court, in its decision upholding the industry, decreed in part:

It is conceded that there is substantial uniformity of the price of cement. Variations of price of one manufacturer are usually followed by variations throughout the trade. The fact is that any changes in the quotations of dealers promptly become well known in the trade through reports of salesmen, agents, and dealers of various manufacturers. It appears to be undisputed that there were frequent changes in price, and uniformity has resulted not from maintaining the price at fixed levels but in the prompt meeting of changes in price by competing sellers.

The defendants (the cement industry) offered much evidence tending to show independence of judgment and action by large expenditures in competitive sales efforts and by variations in the volume of their production, shipments, earnings, and profits.

A great volume of testimony was also given by distinguished economists in support of the thesis that in the case of a standardized product sold wholesale to fully informed professional buyers uniformity of price will inevitably result from active free and unrestrained competition and the Government in its brief (against the industry) concedes that "undoubtedly the price of cement would approach uniformity in a normal market in the absence of all combinations between manufacturers."

Since that decision of the Supreme Court was rendered there has developed within the cement industry a distinct tendency to lean backward in its dealings with the public. For years it has adopted the precept "let the seller beware" lest it again lay itself open to the charges of which it was held guiltless by the courts. In other words, its policy has been to avoid, at all costs, conflict with the Federal, State, and local Governments and the public; yet it is still faced with the necessity of adhering to uniform prices because of inflexible economic laws.

Cement is a highly standardized commodity, both as to quality and process of manufacture. Price is the determining factor. Most cement is sold to dealers and contractors who are necessarily professional buyers. Manufacturers' prices come into comparison with each other on almost every construction job of importance. This makes for keen and fully informed competition, and the delivered prices are necessarily uniform on any particular job or offering.

Such uniformity, however, is in the price quoted to the consumer at the time and not in the net return received by the manufacturers. Neither prices to consumers or net mill returns have been uniform at any one place over a period of years or in several places at the same time.

Cement is a cheap, heavy commodity; and because of the high freight rate the delivered price is usually the mill price of the plant nearest the job, plus the cost of transportation from mill to job. A simple illustration of how prices are arrived at is as follows:

A, B, and C are cement makers seeking business in Washington. A has a 30-cent freight rate, B a 35-cent rate, and C a 40-cent rate. This gives A a 5-cent advantage over B and a 10-cent advantage over C. A figures he can sell at $1.50 a barrel at his mill, so adds the 30 cents freight and quotes cement at $1.80 a barrel Washington. Then if B and C wish to do business in Washington B must absorb a 5 cents additional freight rate and C a 10-cent rate; that is, at his mill B will receive 5 cents less than A and C will receive 10 cents less. If their costs are the same as A's, their profits will necessarily be lower. Unless B and C can make the mill price sacrifices required by the market at Washington they must permit A to monopolize that market.

The cement industry asks only a chance to right itself in a rightful way. For years it has been buffeted; in 1926 the Harding Department of Justice haled the industry before the courts, which culminated in a victory for its methods. Almost before it could readjust itself came the tariff bill, and again for 18 months the industry was uncertain as to whether Congress would decrease the steady flow of imports which were demoralizing its principal centers.

On the day the Hawley-Smoot bill was signed, giving cement a duty, the Senate passed a resolution citing the cement industry before the Tariff Commission to justify the duty which had only that day been granted it. In this case the Commission, after months of study, decided that the duty fixed by Congress was a just one.

In the meantime the Federal Trade Commission of its own volition had started an investigation on base prices in the cement industry—which comprised hundreds of pages with charts and graphs—and also went into uniform prices and kindred matters, and finally was printed.

But before the report was off the press, another Senate resolution was adopted by the Senate calling upon the Federal Trade Commission to investigate all phases of the cement industry, and this investigation is now being conducted. All these proceedings are a disturbance of the normal functions with which an industry naturally concerns itself; and the cement industry for one is ready to cry "enough" to Federal persecution and to ask for a measure of governmental assistance, or at least to be permitted to conduct its business without further badgering.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 160 and ask its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 5755, a bill to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 6 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be considered as having been read for amendment. No amendment shall be in order to said bill except amendments offered by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, and said amendments shall be in order, any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding. Amendments offered by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means may be offered to any section of the bill at the conclusion of the general debate, but said amendments shall not be subject to amendment. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] one half hour, to be used as he may see fit.

Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, this rule provides for 6 hours of general debate. It cuts off all amendments to the bill except amendments offered by the Committee on Ways and Means. Likewise it provides for waiving of all points of order against this bill.

It is a drastic rule. It is a closed rule. It is what I understand the President of the United States desires.

The bill which is brought before the House by the rule now being considered is the very capstone of the column which constitutes the program of recovery set up by the President of the United States. This session of Congress is a special session called by him for the purpose of presenting to the Congress a program of recovery, and this is the most important measure in that program of recovery.

Mr. Speaker, if this bill is opened to amendment, the Lord only knows what will happen; I do not. But I do know the bill represents a program of economic recovery and re-employment carefully worked out. If left open to amendment, the purpose of the President might be thwarted. Friends of the administration in charge of this measure do not wish the bill imperiled.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I wish the gentleman would let me complete my statement.

Mr. GLOVER. I merely wish to ask if the gentleman will tell us the nature of the amendments which will be proposed by the committee.

Mr. POU. The committee will do that.

So, Mr. Speaker, it amounts to this: Those gentlemen who sincerely desire to follow the President of the United States in his effort to bring this Nation out of the bottomless pit of hell in which we found ourselves will support this rule. It is up to you, whether you take it or leave it. That is all there is to it. I make no apology for it. [Applause.]

It is very true that under this bill—and I shall not attempt to discuss its merits—the President of the United States is made a dictator over industry for the time being, but it is a benign dictatorship; it is a dictatorship dedicated to the welfare of all the American people.

The President of the United States will light up no fires of hate. He would make no schisms; he would inspire no conflicts. Under the providence of God, this man is pursuing the humble pathway of service to all the American people. [Applause.] And if you are afraid to trust him in the administration of this bill, you will probably vote against the bill and against the rule; but for my part, I am proud to trust him and proud to follow him. [Applause.]

When I remember the condition of the country less than 3 months back, and when I observe the conditions which already exist, I am actually afraid not to go down the line to the end of the row and help this man in the White House carry out his complete program of recovery. [Applause.] At this moment he is not only the leader in the effort to bring about recovery in this Nation but he is the leader of the world. [Applause.] He is bringing back prosperity at home, and already he is the leader in a world-wide movement for world peace.

As I stand here I thank Almighty God that in the change and political revolution through which we have passed such a man has been placed in the chair of the Presidency of the United States.

I follow him gladly in his efforts by voting to put through this great measure which will put millions of people to work, which will do away with the obstacles in the way of economic recovery, and will complete the program of this man, every drop of whose blood is dedicated to the great, noble, unselfish task of serving all the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is another closed rule. No amendment can be offered unless it is offered by the committee having the bill in charge.

To my mind the bill should have been divided into three separate bills under the headings of industrial, building, and tax. Title I of the bill, under the industrial recovery clause, has nothing whatever to do with the balance of the bill. It Russianizes the business of America. It makes orders from Washington final as to your business. There is no appeal, not even to the courts. It imposes penalties for disobedience of orders that will emanate from Washington. And still we call this the land of the free!

The building portion of the bill calls for the expenditure of $3,300,000,000, which will place an additional tax on the taxpayers of your country. It is unjust, and when one thinks in terms of economy it is to laugh in derision at such a term. The bill increases the normal income-tax rate to 6 percent on the first $4,000 and 10 percent on higher incomes. It increases the tax on gasoline and places a double tax on stock dividends. The numerous excise taxes are to be continued to July 1, 1935.

I believe the bill to be unconstitutional, but will leave that argument to one versed in the law.

I sincerely hope the Membership of this House will vote against the passage of the rule. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. POUL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the series of rules that has been proposed for legislation that originates with the administration in these particularly critical times. As a member of the Rules Committee I am perfectly willing to acknowledge that the procedure that is used in passing these emergency measures in these critical times is not the ordinary procedure of this House or the procedure that would be desired by most of the men on my side of the aisle; but I cannot believe that the United States as a nation was ever confronted with as critical a situation, calling for action, and immediate action, with reference to our economic relief in taking care of unemployment and in taking care of the many problems that have confronted the Congress such as the one we have today. So these unusual rules are offered for the purpose of taking care of unusual situations.

The people of America on the 4th day of March looked to the new leadership for action, and for immediate action, and for one, I am trying to follow this leadership and to get action in these days of emergency as soon as possible.

We are not living under any dictatorship. There never was a President of the United States who was more willing to cooperate and confer with the Congress than the man who now sits in the White House. He does not assume to himself any powers of dictatorship that he is not willing to surrender at the earliest moment, and the Congress at any time can take back any unusual powers given to the President to take care of the emergency that now exists.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I would rather finish my statement at this time. The gentleman can get time later.

The Rules Committee is endeavoring to get their major legislative committees in these times. We are supporting the Banking and Currency Committee, the Ways and Means Committee, and any of the other committees bringing out these emergency measures in order to give them an opportunity to pass these measures and pass them speedily and get action as soon as possible; and the House has supported these unusual rules each time one of them has been submitted on these unusual measures, and as long as a majority of this House sustain the Rules Committee with such majorities as they have on these unusual rules, we will take it to be the policy of the House to continue such rules with respect to this class of legislation.

This is probably the most important bill that has come before this session of Congress or will come before it. Unemployment is the gravest problem and the greatest menace confronting our Nation today. I can conceive of no situation that is more critical than to have as large a proportion of our people unemployed as we have now in America. Nothing but war could be more critical, and there are even phases of our unemployment that destroy the morale of our people and bring us to a lower level even than warfare. So it is to solve this situation that a public-works measure, a bill to take care of the unemployed, is brought out under this particular kind of rule.

My colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] spoke of this measure as one that has three distinct proposals. I cannot reach the conclusion that the gentleman does that these proposals are not coordinated in this one measure.

The second title provides for public works. Nothing is needed more in America than an opportunity to be employed, and the Government must lead the States and municipalities and the private corporations and lend every assistance to put every man and woman in employment in the next few months in order to save the industrial and economic situation of America. So title II provides for various projects.

Title III takes care of the taxation feature. We cannot expend a sum of $3,300,000,000, in the present situation of our Treasury, without making provision for additional taxes, and we could sit here for 3 weeks and discuss the most painless and the best methods of taxation and no two of us would probably reach the same conclusion.

The bill contains a specific allocation of $400,000,000 for highway construction. It has been the effort of both the States and the Federal Government that at least a portion of the money spent for highways shall be raised by gasoline taxes. This would be sufficient reason for putting this item in the bill.

Cash dividends of domestic corporations are also to be taxed. I have always been one who believed that this class of earnings should be taxed the same as other income is taxed.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I would rather finish my statement at this time.

So I believe it is just to tax the cash dividends of domestic corporations because it makes a new basis of earning power for those who receive them, and these same corporations that many times have cut large melons have not laid aside any reserve whatever to take care of unemployment and labor when times of distress arrive. The inventions with respect to machinery have been capitalized and have displaced man power and increased the earning power of corporations, and yet labor has not shared in any of the advantages of the increased earning power as a result of inventions of machinery; and when a depression like this comes, the first to suffer are the wage earners with no reserves set up to hold them on the pay rolls. I believe in creating such reserves and in imposing taxation on earnings of whatever character, whether paid in cash or paid as cash dividends.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I should like to finish my statement, if the gentleman please. The gentleman can get his own time to answer these arguments.

As to title I, which is to take care of the industrial situation with codes of ethics for various industries, is one that is fair. I know of several industries where there has been a uniform agreement as to wages and working conditions, but one or two rebellious companies have destroyed just compensation in that field because they would not conform to a fair code of ethics.

I know the coal industry and the limestone industry in my district. Three or four companies persist in unfair practices and in not paying the prevailing wage. We are living in a new day. I know you can go back, and from the standpoint of constitutionality and individualism, say that this is revolutionary, but I say to you that the new day is going to be different from the old day. We may as well make up our minds that we are going through a transition period that will give the laboring man a fair opportunity to be sure of his security if unemployment arises in times of distress; that earnings will be distributed upon a basis of fairness between capital and labor.

I am willing that the Supreme Court should say whether the regulations of industry and individuals in these particulars of trade practices are constitutional.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POUL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time on the rule be extended 20 minutes, one half to be controlled by myself and one half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. This is satisfactory to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CULLEN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, no one can be more sympathetic with the purpose of this legislation than I. My sole regret is that the leadership of the House should bring this legislation to us in such a form we cannot eliminate some of the evils, because I think every Member of the House is anxious to contribute his full share toward business recovery.

Coming as I do from one of the greatest and most varied industrial districts of the country, I am in complete sympathy with the movement for uniformity of labor laws; with conditions which mean higher wages and better living conditions. I want to eliminate cutthroat competition and see legitimate business have an opportunity to thrive in this country; because if it does thrive, it will be able to improve conditions and solve this depression. I regret this bill is not more specific, that it does not give us more details as to operation.

There is nothing definite as to what will be done. We are expected to take it all in good faith. In other words, we are asked to sail an unknown sea, without chart or compass, and without knowledge of the navigator who is to steer us.

The Chairman of the Rules Committee said we must accept the legislation in good faith. I have faith in the President of the United States, and I have demonstrated that in the past. My faith, however, is not so great today as it was several weeks ago, when I look at the way the economy bill is being administered. No Member of Congress ever dreamed regulations would be drafted which would cut a disabled veteran who suffered in the World War. No one that I know of wanted to cut a soldier injured in battle, or who suffered disability because of service for his country. No one expected a Spanish War veteran, 35 years after the war, to try to prove war-service disability. I hope for an early revision of these unfair regulations.

I question whether the best interests of the country warrant this huge expenditure for public works. We can never spend the country into prosperity. If we are excessive in this type of expenditure, we are likely to find the heavy burden placed on those forced to pay the bills will retard business fully as much as it stimulates it.

The veteran has had his pension cut. The never-overpaid Government employee has been forced to lower his standard of living. With this as the background, should we now spend hundreds of millions of dollars for questionable projects, some of which will demand constant maintenance charges and will add to the regular expenditures of the Government? I grant the need of some program, but I question the wisdom of one of this magnitude.

I doubt very much, because of the fact that cities and towns will be forced to contribute, whether they can obtain the relief necessary because of their heavy welfare demands.

I am impressed with one outstanding thought when I observe who is to contribute the revenue to pay for this public-works program. Neither courage nor statesmanship are revealed here. If this is part of the new deal, it certainly is not a square deal. There is no extension of the tax burden. You just take the same group of small industries, manufacturers who are too few in number and too small in wealth to maintain a lobby; industries now groggy and on the verge of bankruptcy. You say to them, "We cannot place a sales tax on the big fellow; he will not stand for it. But we are going to put a tax of 5 and 10 percent on you and call it an excise tax." We impose increased taxes on the income-tax payer of the smaller brackets, many of whom are struggling desperately to retain homes bought when more favorable conditions existed in the country. Then there is another tax on gasoline, although that commodity bends heavily in carrying the burdens of State and Nation. I ask you seriously whether it would not be wise to stop and deliberate whether we should take up this legislation under a closed rule. Every one of you realizes the bill needs amendments, and the only way you can get them is to vote down this gag rule and give the Membership of the House an opportunity to adopt perfecting amendments. If you consider the bill under the amendment rule, I am sure we will give the country a much better bill than the one before us.

At least, we will give them a bill which represents the views of 435 congressional districts and not the ideas of a select few. As one who wants to see business recovery, as one who is in hearty sympathy with the administration in its efforts to bring the country back where it belongs, I ask you to vote down this rule and proceed in an orderly way to amend the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. POUL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it had not been my purpose to make any statement during the consideration of the rule which makes in order the consideration of this measure. Yet I feel it is fair that some member of the Committee on Ways and Means should give the Membership of the House the benefit of some information touching upon certain amendments which have been considered by the committee and upon which favorable action has been taken since the bill was reported by the committee. It is for the purpose of conveying that information that I rise at this time and ask your indulgence. As we all know, the Committee on Ways and Means was pressed for time in the consideration of this important measure. There are some 20 pages of the bill and it has many complicated sections and provisions. When the bill was originally introduced the tax section was not included. After the committee had considered the bill and acted upon various sections and provisions of it, then the tax section was incorporated and is a part of the new bill which is introduced, and will now be before the House for consideration. It was about 10 o'clock at night when we finished consideration of the tax section of the bill. It was thought then that certain other amendments would have to be worked and agreed upon. The bill provides for certain definite and specific taxes to finance this particular measure and the work that is contemplated under the public-works section, or title II of the bill. In addition the excise taxes now in existence are continued for a period of 1 year. That is for the very obvious purpose of making the tax base upon which this structure may rest not only safe and secure but as certain as possible, because we have to issue and sell $3,300,000,000 worth of bonds to finance the public-works section of the bill.

I want now to briefly touch upon the amendments agreed upon in the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Briefly.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I want to know why the committee raised the income taxes up to incomes of $10,000 and did not raise them on incomes above that.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I think, if the gentleman will carefully consider the report accompanying the bill, he will get ample information on that point. He will observe that the increase in normal rates affects all incomes.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I get information but no reason.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will permit me now to touch on these amendments that were agreed on this morning. First, the committee has agreed and will offer an amendment providing that losses in income-tax returns cannot be extended over a year, as is now the case, and over a period of 2 years, as was the case before the last revenue measure. In other words, the credit for losses to be taken on a return must be taken for the year covering the return in which the loss was sustained. A subcommittee is now at work on appropriate language to accomplish that purpose, and that amendment will be offered by the committee.

In addition to that, the committee has agreed upon an amendment which will be offered, carrying out the express will of the House a short time ago with reference to the tax on electrical energy. The same provision will be incorporated in this bill by this committee amendment which was adopted by the House when the revenue measure was under consideration a short time ago, which means that the tax will be levied on the producer instead of the consumer.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. In other words, the committee amendment will require that the tax on electrical energy for domestic and commercial consumption shall be paid by the producer and not the consumer?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. It is substantially the amendment that was offered by the gentleman and adopted by the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. POUL. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. In addition to that, I want to call attention to the fact that another change was made by committee amendment adopted this morning, which will be offered, restoring the provisions of the original bill on the question of the allocation of funds for road construction purposes. That is, instead of following the present provisions of the law with reference to an equal one third apportionment on the basis of population, area, and mileage, the provision contained in the original bill will be restored, to apportion among the several States, three fourths in accordance with the provisions of section 21 of the Federal Highway Act, approved November 9, 1921, as amended and supplemented, and one fourth in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the total population of the United States, according to the latest decennial census. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] has again expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped the day for closed rules was over as far as this Congress is concerned. We have considered this week under open rules the banking and currency bill and the insurance bill which was passed yesterday. Those bills were read under the 5-minute rule; everybody was given an opportunity to offer amendments at the end of each section and to express himself on his amendment as he saw fit. It seemed to me we got along all right under these rules. We proceeded as a legislative body should; but here today again we are confronted with a closed rule on perhaps the most important piece of legislation that ever came before the American Congress. It contains three unrelated, separate, and distinct legislative propositions of far-reaching importance, and this House, under the rule which we are now considering, if it is adopted, will not have an opportunity to express itself separately upon any one of the great questions of policy involved.

The distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POW], the honored Chairman of the Rules Committee, quite frankly said he made no apology for the rule. I could not help but notice that he attempted no defense of it either, except to say it was an administration measure and the administration wanted it passed. The gentleman from North Carolina also said, and I use his exact language—that this legislation makes the President of the United States a dictator over industry for the time being.

That is a very accurate and fair statement. This legislation, to repeat the language of the gentleman from North Carolina, makes the President of the United States a dictator over industry for the time being, provides for a construction program that involves the expenditure of $3,300,000,000, and adds an annual tax burden of $220,000,000 to the carrying charges of the public debt. The House is asked to pass all those three propositions under a rule which permits of no amendment and which requires the House to vote upon all three of them together. If this rule is passed, we must vote them up or down together, without any opportunity to express our judgment on any one of them separately. I say that no legislation of this importance can be decently whipped into shape in the short time which has elapsed between the time when this bill was sent here by the President, together with his message, and today, and certainly there has been no sufficient time to enable the House to get the reaction of the country in regard to it. I have looked in vain for some Member of the majority to resent that part of the President's message which said to this House in substance: "You must bring in a tax measure here by the first of this week or within 3 or 4 days from the time the message was delivered, or I will send up a tax measure of my own."

Has it come to pass that the House of Representatives and the Congress of the United States must jump at the crack of the whip by the President? Must the House of Representatives not only pass the legislation recommended by the President without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i", but must it do so on the exact minute he suggests as well? The House owes it to itself to take time to consider and digest legislation of this importance and to know what is proposed to be accomplished by it better than any Member of the House knows what is to be accomplished by this legislation before passing upon it.

As one who voted against the so-called "economy legislation", which was passed early in the session, I have been amused during the last few days to see Members rise on this floor and apologize for their vote on that legislation. They say now that they did not know what was in the legislation, that they did not know that those responsible for it intended to go so far as they have gone. They did not know that those who were to administer it were going to be as ruthless in the administration of it as they have been. That is the objection to clothing people with blanket authority. The law should determine the right and duties of people. I say to you now you do not know how this legislation is going to be carried out any more than you knew how that legislation was going to be carried out. It is quite probable that those who will be affected by this legislation will in a few months be just as bitter toward it as those are now who have been affected by the passage of the economy legislation.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. I was just thinking it would have been very interesting if the gentleman had made the same kind of speech he is now making against a rule of this kind when the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill was pending before the House and considered by his party under exactly the same rule that is proposed here. The gentleman gave that rule his hearty support.

Mr. MAPES. We have gone over that question so many times during this session of Congress that I do not want to take up time this morning in discussing it. [Laughter.] I supposed it had been admitted on all sides that as a practical matter, tariff legislation, which contains so many items, must be passed under some such rule, but in no case that I now remember did any Republican Administration ever propose to consider legislative proposals of this importance under a closed rule.

What does this bill do? Title I makes the President, as the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina has said, a dictator over industry. Title II authorizes a construction program amounting in the aggregate to $3,300,000,000, and adds $220,000,000 per year to the tax burden of the people of the United States at a time when they are already overburdened with taxes.

Insofar as it goes the bill breaks down, and is another blow at the Civil Service.

It seems to me there is a studied purpose in this Congress to tear down the Civil Service laws and regulations. This legislation, among other things, authorizes the President to appoint any officers and employees he sees fit to appoint, to fix their compensation as he sees fit, and to prescribe their powers and duties and length of office as he sees fit without regard to the Civil Service. The Members of the House received a letter this morning from the president and the secretary of the National Federation of Federal Employees protesting against and pointing out the hardship of this feature of the bill at a time when so many regular Civil Service employees are losing their jobs.

Do you gentlemen who yesterday attempted to limit the salary of executive officers of insurance companies to $17,500 per year know that this bill authorizes the Administrator of Public Works, once he has been appointed by the President, to spend $3,300,000,000 in any way he sees fit, to employ any employees he sees fit, and to pay them any salary he sees fit?

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The bill that was passed yesterday was passed by the gentleman's side of the House.

Mr. MAPES. Not by my vote. I voted against it, and the Republicans, with scarcely one third of the Membership of the House, can hardly be charged with the responsibility for its passage. But that is a matter that is past. I am calling attention now to what is sought to be done today by this rule. If this rule is passed no opportunity will be afforded to offer any amendment to fix or limit the compensation at all of any officer or employee appointed by the Administrator of Public Works. The sky will be the limit. He will have $3,300,000,000 to use as he sees fit, limited only by the construction program outlined in general terms in the bill.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to my colleague and friend from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman is a member of the Rules Committee, I understand.

Mr. MAPES. I am, but I voted against this resolution.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. As I understand, the President's message asked the adoption of a public-works program, but stated that he desired to leave to the House of Representatives the matter of the form of taxation. Could not a rule be adopted by which the first two titles of the bill could be brought to the House under a closed, or gag, rule, and the third portion of the bill, relating to taxation, be left to the House of Representatives?

Mr. MAPES. Certainly it could. I hope the gentleman will join in voting down the previous question on this rule, and then some such amendment to the rule as he suggests can be adopted or, better still, an amendment could be adopted to consider the legislation under the general rules of the House, which would permit the reading of the entire bill section by section and the offering of amendments at the end of each section.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. In the gentleman's long experience in this House, did he ever see the Republican side of the House bring in such a rule as he now suggests?

Mr. MAPES. No; because Republican rules have been open rules, which provided for the consideration of legislation under the general rules of the House and for reading of the entire bill under the 5-minute rule, which gives Members a right to offer amendments at the end of every section.

Mr. Speaker, I asked the legislative reference department to get me a copy of the legislation making Hitler the dictator in Germany. That legislation has some similarity to this.

I have a photostatic copy of what I think is the act. It is as follows:

[From Financial Chronicle, Mar. 25, 1933]

From the Berlin advices to the same paper we take as follows the text of the dictatorship act:

TEXT OF DICTATORSHIP ACT

"The text of the enabling act by which the Hitler Cabinet becomes a dictatorship follows:

"ARTICLE I. Federal laws may be enacted by the Government [the Cabinet] outside of the procedure provided in the Constitution, including article LXXXV, paragraph 2, providing that the budget must be adopted by legislative act, and article LXXXVII of the Constitution, providing for legislative action to authorize the Government to make loans and credits.

"ART. II. The laws decreed by the Government may deviate from the Constitution so far as they do not deal with the institutions of the Reichstag and the Federal Council as such. The prerogatives of the President remain untouched.

"ART. III. The laws decreed by the Government are to be drafted by the Chancellor and announced in the Reichsgesetzblatt [the organ in which laws are published]. If not otherwise ordered, they shall become effective the day following the announcement.

Articles LXVIII to LXXVII of the Constitution, regulating the procedure of the announcement and publication of the laws, do not apply to laws decreed by the Government.

"ART. IV. For treaties of the Reich with foreign nations regarding matters of the Reich's legislative authority the consent of legislative bodies is not needed so long as this act is in force. The Government shall issue decrees necessary for the enforcing of these treaties.

"ART. V. This law shall become effective on the day it is announced. It shall remain in effect until April 1, 1937. It shall expire when the present Government is replaced by another one.

"The German Cabinet of 11 members contains 3 Nazis: Chancellor Hitler, Dr. Wilhelm F. Frick, and Hermann Wilhelm Goering. The others are Nationalists and personal appointees of President von Hindenburg. The leaders of the majority element are Vice Chancellor von Papen and Dr. Alfred Hugenberg. The Cabinet includes Franz Seldte, leader of the Stahlhelm, the organization of war veterans, and Gen. Werner von Blomberg, the Minister of Defense, who has charge of the Reichswehr, the standing army.

"The powers of the President include the right to appoint and dismiss the Chancellor."

That is the language of the act by which the German Parliament abdicated and made Hitler dictator over Germany. In doing so it reserved to itself the right to pass the laws authorizing "the Government to make loans and credits." But this bill authorizes the Administrator of Public Works to spend $3,300,000,000 on public works as he sees fit. He is not confined in his expenditure of the money to public works entirely. The bill expressly provides that he may aid "in the financing of such railroad maintenance and equipment as may be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission as desirable for improvement of transportation facilities."

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman mean to say that under the provisions of this bill the President may adopt rules and regulations by which the administrator of the bill may expend this $3,300,000,000 on just such projects as he wishes and in just such manner as he wishes to expend it?

Mr. MAPES. There is some limitation in the act, of course, on the projects; but it is almost unlimited. He can expend the money as he sees fit on the projects defined in the act. The President can even determine the national-defense policy of the United States. The bill provides "if in the opinion of the President it seems desirable" for "the construction of naval vessels within the terms and/or limits established by the London Naval Treaty of 1930, and of aircraft required therefor and construction of such Army housing projects as the President may approve, and provision of original equipment for the mechanization or motorization of such Army tactical units as he may designate." Who ever heard of conferring such power on any one man? These are national policies which should be determined by Congress.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Under the rules and regulations that may be adopted by the President, and the operation of the act under this administrator, will it be possible for the administration to discontinue the building of post offices and other public buildings throughout the country as authorized in previous legislation, if they desire to?

Mr. MAPES. Absolutely. Let me say to the gentleman from Kentucky that the public sentiment of the country last year condemned very severely the legislation which was proposed then that attempted to set up in detail the places where public buildings would be constructed and the amount involved was much less than it is here. I venture the assertion that if this bill attempted to say where this $3,300,000,000 was to be expended that the country would rise up in revolt against its passage. The extravagance and waste of the proposition would then be apparent.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If I recall correctly, the gentleman was a Member of the House and voted that Congress surrender to Mr. Mellon, the Secretary of the Treasury, all power over the building program of the United States. Congress for years has delegated to the Treasury Department all that power as to what particular buildings shall be built in the United States.

Mr. MAPES. No; I think the gentleman is mistaken, or his statement at least is subject to qualifications. There is a departmental board on which are representatives of three departments of the Government, which pass upon the projects under existing law, as I understand it, and there is a great difference between the paltry $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 with which this board has to deal and the $3,300,000,000 provided for in this bill.

I realize that this is an inopportune time to consider legislation of this importance. No one can be quite sure that he is thinking straight on it. During the consideration of the securities legislation a few days ago, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] said that it was an unfortunate time to be considering such legislation because so many people had been stung during the last few years in the purchase of securities. It is especially unfortunate to be considering legislation of this importance at this time, when industry is whipped and labor is out of employment. Neither one can think clearly on it. I read in my local paper yesterday that the manufacturers' committee of the Association of Commerce of Grand Rapids endorsed the industrial-control feature of this legislation. I wonder if the members of that committee understand that this legislation authorizes the President, if he sees fit to exercise the power which it confers upon him, to require them to secure a license from the organization which he may set up under this legislation in order to continue in business, and if he finds that they have violated any code of fair competition, so called, or other regulations promulgated by him for the conduct of their business, that he may suspend or revoke their license to do business, and that his order "suspending or revoking" any such license shall be final if in accordance with law. In other words, the President may determine whether anyone can start a business, the products of which go into interstate commerce, and once started whether he can continue to do business.

The bill also expressly provides that "the President may differentiate according to experience and skill of the employees affected and according to the locality of employment."

No one before was ever given such absolute control over industry in America. The power which the administrator of this legislation will have to reward his friends and punish his enemies, will be unlimited and, if sustained by the courts, it will not only take away from management the right to run its own business to an extent undreamed of before, but it will also take away from the States whatever power they now have to regulate working conditions in all industry which affects interstate commerce. This legislation spells Government interference with business with a vengeance.

The bill in its present shape is neither satisfactory to industry nor to labor. I shall vote against the rule and if the rule is adopted, so that the House is required to vote the legislation up or down as it stands, I shall vote against the bill.

I think if we could have an opportunity to consider this legislation under the 5-minute rule and read it section by section for amendment, we could perfect and improve it very materially.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As I understand, the gentleman does not approve of the delegation of power by the President to the Administrator in connection with the public-building program. Does not the gentleman well know—and I am sure he does, because he is a very, very capable and distinguished Member of this House—that under the present law the power over the building program is delegated to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General, and they in turn delegate the power to select sites and to make an allocation of the money to a joint committee of subordinates known as "a joint committee of the Post Office and Treasury Departments."

Mr. MAPES. That is left to an interdepartmental board, and the board has to come before the Appropriations Committee of Congress and set out in detail where it expects to spend the money. Here we are passing on all of this appropriation without any knowledge as to where or upon what projects the money is to be spent.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And their recommendations, I may say, are accepted or no public buildings are constructed.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I hope that no Democrat will be misled by the insincere attacks upon this rule. Yesterday we brought in an open rule and gave the gentlemen on the other side a chance to support some of the amendments. What did they do? In every instance they voted against us, and all they are trying to do today is to mislead you, so as to make it difficult for us to pass this proposed legislation, which I consider the most important of any that we have had before us at this or at any other session of Congress.

If there be any objectionable features in this bill, they will only be temporary, whereas all the provisions for construction work and for aiding the States and municipalities which are beneficial are of a permanent nature. Therefore, I feel it is our duty, if we desire to relieve conditions and create reemployment and to improve business and get the wheels of commerce turning again, to overlook at this time some of the minor, objectionable features and vote for the bill, because it is a real, constructive, helpful, and much-needed piece of legislation.

Though I should like to see a tax on all transfers of stocks and on the short sales of stocks and commodities, an increased tax on incomes over $100,000, and an excess profit tax on corporations, this bill contains provisions that will actually provide for the immediate reemployment of hundreds of thousands of people.

This bill also contains the fair competition provision, as well as the agreement and license provision, which I feel will be fairly administered, to the advantage of the laboring people and the business of the Nation.

It takes over many of the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, decreasing its bonds by $1,200,000,000, actually reducing by that amount heretofore-authorized bonds issued, and I have the assurance of the members of the committee that they will offer the following amendment, which I am satisfied will be of great aid to finance deserving projects by States and municipalities, in compliance with the appeals to the mayors of the large cities of the United States, as expressed in their conference held in the city yesterday:

On page 13, line 25, after the figures "202", strike out the semicolon and insert a comma and add the following: "such financing to be made by loans to or the purchase of the bonds, tax-anticipation warrants, or securities of the State or political subdivision thereof which is to construct such project or projects."

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I wish I could yield to the gentleman, but I do not have the time.

I voted for the rule yesterday and voted with you gentlemen and helped you make your fight, but we were not supported by the Republicans, and again today they apparently would like to make it appear that some of us are waging a fight against the rule, meanwhile laughing up their sleeves because they have again misled a lot of well-intentioned, good, sincere Democrats.

I appeal to you to vote for this rule and let us get this needed measure through as speedily as possible. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, we are not only facing a new deal but we ought to comprehend thoroughly that we are facing a new day. We ought to understand perfectly well just what we are doing. I regret more than I can say that I am not going to be able to vote for this rule.

We ought to understand that what we have always held as individualism in America has come to an end. I, for one, welcome the end of the abuses that have come about under this doctrine.

The constant intrusion in, and control of, government by big business has finally compelled government to take control of business, and we are not only going to do that but we are going to do it with a vengeance.

I am going to be for this bill. But I regret exceedingly that I cannot support the rule under which the bill is to be brought up. It is a gag rule pure, plain, and simple and entirely prevents any effective discussion of the principles involved or the right of Members to offer amendments.

This is the most important bill that has come before the American Congress in the entire history of this Government, because it marks clearly the end of the old system and the coming of the new. We ought to appreciate this, and we ought to discuss it with the utmost freedom in an attempt to understand the meaning of such a tremendous step.

I repeat that I shall vote for the bill; I repeat, also, that in all good conscience I must vote against the rule. Because I believe that we ought to take all the time necessary, a whole week if necessary—and this would not be too much—in which to discuss this measure, where we are changing the entire system of government in this great Republic of ours. I regret that, after 35 years of study of this question during all of which time I saw clearly its approach, my attempt to get before this body some of the ideas I have formed during this time appears likely to be limited to the 3 minutes that have been kindly given to me by my friend the Chairman of the Rules Committee at the present moment.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that we may not be able to lay out to the fullest possible extent every idea that any of us may have, because only through this means can we come to the kind of agreement and understanding that the American Congress has always heretofore believed they ought to come to, after free, fair, and open discussion.

I do not believe that any man in this body is willing to follow the President of the United States more ardently than I am. From the very moment he came into office I have only voted once against what was held out to me as one of his policies, and that was on the so-called "economy bill", and I certainly do not regret that vote. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I think we can all agree that, with the possible exception of the resolution declaring war in 1917, this is the most important bill that has come before Congress in this century.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if any Member of this body, who took an oath to perform his duty as a lawmaker, votes for this rule and thereby voluntarily binds and shackles himself—yes, and meekly applies the gag to his own face—let him forever be estopped from finding fault with any particular provision of the measure, and let him receive the well-merited criticism and contempt of every thinking constituent.

I deplore this arbitrary resignation and abdication of the power and responsibility that should be the proper burden and justifiable pride of every member of a law-making body. [Applause.]

Let us vote down the previous question, and let us amend the rule, making it more liberal. Failing there, let us vote down this vicious rule. If we do, have no fear, another rule will be brought in, and we will be given our constitutional privilege as legislators of discussing the measure and, in addition, of offering and considering amendments that many of us believe to be of greatest importance.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Did not the House recently vote by a tremendous majority not to place the tax of electrical energy on the consumer? Here we find that tax again saddled on the consumer and not on the producer.

Mr. KVALE. Yes; and the bringing in of a provision to tax the consumer in the present bill is nothing short of impudence on the part of the committee.

Mr. RAGON. I want to say to the gentleman that the committee has voted to put the Whittington amendment in the bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am pleased to get that information. It is exactly what should be done.

Mr. KVALE. Let me say to the gentleman from Arkansas that I do want to be fair, and that if the committee has just taken such action I willingly withdraw the remark I made.

But, Mr. Speaker, what I have said about the rule still stands. We must act now to make it possible to consider this bill in keeping with the dignity that should clothe this body and to live up to our solemn responsibilities. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I intend, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] said in his remarks he intended to do, to cast my vote for the bill, but I am against this rule, and I hope the House will vote down the rule. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] came before the steering committee the other day and suggested that the Ways and Means Committee put the excess-profit tax into this bill. The committee had already reported the bill, so it was too late at that time to offer that to the Committee. The excess-profit tax would be real legislation in the interest of the little fellow. I should like to see this bill opened up for amendment so that we might offer an excess-profits-tax amendment. I should like to see income-tax legislation passed that would make J. P. Morgan pay an income tax just as the little fellow has to pay his.

The Committee on Labor, of which I am chairman, has labored day after day and week after week during this session at hearings and sessions on the 5-day week, 6-hour day bill, and the good labor features in title I of this bill are the direct result of the work of the Committee on Labor because these features were borrowed from our bill and inserted in this bill. The reason that organized labor has favored this bill before us is because there is a three and a half billion dollar public-works program in it and they felt they must support the entire bill before the Ways and Means Committee or lose this appropriation for labor. As far as title I of this bill is concerned, labor has declared again and again that labor wants the bill reported out by the Committee on Labor and that it is infinitely better for labor than the industrial-recovery section of this bill. President Green, of the American Federation of Labor, stated before the Ways and Means Committee that he favored the so-called "Connery bill." Labor leaders throughout the Nation have declared that the bill reported out by the Committee on Labor is the best legislation for labor that has ever been reported to the Congress in its history. [Applause.]

I should like to see this rule voted down so that I might offer the bill reported by the Committee on Labor as a substitute for title I.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I should like to ask the gentleman if this man Johnson is not an employee of Barney Baruch?

Mr. CONNERY. I understand he is his man.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. You mean he is his boy. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNERY. I hope that the House will vote down this rule so that we can offer amendments that will strengthen this bill, thereby doing justice and giving fair play to labor, industry, and the farmer. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand what is meant by some Members saying that they "will vote for this bill", which they hold in their hand, "but will not vote for the rule." If they mean another bill, all right; but I do not know how they can say at this moment that they will vote for this bill in front of them but will not vote for the rule. I appeal again to my Democratic side of the House not to be misled by the unified front of the Republican side, because no matter what rule we might have brought in, whether like the one suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] or not, the Republican side of the House would vote against the rule.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. We have had that sabotage right along.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I cannot.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman makes a misstatement.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Very well; I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Bring in an open rule and we will support it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, yes. Of course no one would vote against an open rule. The only way the bill could come in is under a rule, and there could be no reason in voting against an open rule.

Mr. SNELL. We are willing to consider the bill on its merits.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, I understand the politics being played on the Republican side.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I should like the gentleman to give me some way by which, when I go home, I can explain to my people why I voted to raise income taxes up to $10,000, and did not carry the raise the rest of the way through?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I feel sure the committee will explain the economics of that to the satisfaction of anybody who does not want to mislead the people of America by saying that when you come to taxes by raising the taxes only in the lower brackets you do an injustice to the average citizen. High surtaxes raise no taxes. The normal tax is imposed on the rich as well as those who are taxed on small incomes after the high exemptions.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. COX. In fixing the 6 hours of general debate upon the bill, what was the understanding of the Committee on Rules as to the division of that time, as to whether the opposition should have any part of the time?

Mr. O'CONNOR. It is the understanding of the Rules Committee at all times that the time allotted is to be equally divided between those in favor of the bill and those opposed to it.

Mr. COX. Of course.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, the Members on the Democratic side of the House were elected under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Mr. HOEPEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No. It was thought that in this session of Congress the big test of following the Democratic leadership of our President was the vote on the economy bill.

I believe now that this, the greatest bill backed by the administration, the most far-reaching piece of legislation ever put before any parliamentary body in all the world, in all time, is the progressive test of our democracy. I feel confident the real Democrats will support the President on this bill, and the only way by which real Democrats can support the President is to carry out his program by voting for the adoption of this rule.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD].

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I was convinced at the beginning of this debate that if there was one scriptural passage to which the Ways and Means Committee had studiously given its approbation, it was that passage that says that "in the days of Claudius Caesar a decree was issued that all the world should be taxed." They have changed that a little bit. They have had an afterthought and have eliminated from this bill one evil, which is the consumer's tax on electric energy. That has been eliminated, and if you will vote down this rule we will eliminate a lot of other evils in this bill. [Applause.] I am not opposed to the bill. I am opposed to the evils in it. I believe the President is opposed to the evils, too.

There has been a lot of talk about title I of the bill. Under title I of this bill you are absolutely destroying organized labor. You are putting a ban upon thousands of railroad yards in this country, thousands of shops that are closed shops today. They talked to us before the Committee on Labor about the mavericks who were cutting wages, the 10 percent; but, Mr. Speaker, it is not the 10 percent that are cutting wages in this country, it is the 80 percent, it is men like Swope and Sloan who testified before that committee that a bare existence was a proper minimum wage in this country. Mr. Swope's definition was "sufficient to keep body and soul together."

Mr. HOEPEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Not now. Mr. Swope is the head of the General Electric and controls not only the manufacture of electrical appliances in this country, with his associates in that line, but controls also the distribution. He will make the trade agreements that you will find approved by this administrator. Trade agreements that will eliminate every small business man in the Nation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, the best speech made on the floor of the House today in favor of the defeat of this gag rule was made by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] when he reminded the House that his Ways and Means Committee had so little time to prepare the tax measures that are carried in this bill. That is his excuse for a bill that will go further to destroy public confidence in the Government than anything that has transpired, at least in the last 3 months, notwithstanding what is transpiring on the Senate side of the Capitol today.

Let us see what the bill does for revenue. It increases the taxes of the man or woman who gets from $3,000 to $6,000 a year, and they are legion in this country; it increases their taxes 50 percent. The butcher, the baker, the doctor, the professional man, the lawyer, who makes from $3,000 to $6,000 a year. The storekeeper in my district, who, with his wife and a couple of children working for him, may make $10 or $12 or $15 a day if he is thrifty. You are raising his taxes 50 percent. What about the taxes for a millionaire like Morgan, who is just now testifying before a senatorial committee? Although he made millions in the past 3 years, he has not paid a penny into the Federal Treasury as income taxes. This bill carries a very unimportant increase in his taxes, only 2½ percent as against 50 percent increase in the lower brackets. The tax of the man who makes $500,000 is increased but 3½ percent. The man who makes $200,000, 4½ percent; $100,000, 6 percent; $70,000, 9 percent; $50,000, 11 percent; but the little business man, your friend and mine, who is striving to put a few dollars away for a rainy day, is increased 50 percent. A major portion of the $46,000,000 expected from the increase to these taxes will come from the so-called "little man."

This rule ought to be voted down. When I suggested a moment ago that this obnoxious rule and bill would destroy confidence in our Government, I merely suggest this as in addition to what has been transpiring on Capitol Hill in the last 2 days, when a man worth several hundred million dollars admits that in the last 4 years he has not paid a single dollar in income taxes. Do you realize that that is going to shatter confidence in our Government?

I have every confidence in the honesty and purpose and the integrity of Government officials generally, yet I cannot help but believe that the millions of American citizens who are reading the J. Pierpont Morgan testimony before the Senate committee, in their local newspaper, would feel a greater confidence in their Government if the men whose names are mentioned in that preferred list of the House of Morgan would resign from their positions. I say that without desire to reflect upon such high-type men as Secretary of the Treasury Woodin and Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Acheson, whose law firm has represented the House of Morgan for a long time. Mr. Norman H. Davis, special ambassador of President Roosevelt, now in Europe, should come home and not allow himself to become embarrassing to the President. He has long been known as a Morgan butterfly and while in Europe undoubtedly is of considerable value to the Bank of Morgan. [Applause.] This rule ought to be voted down, so that we can offer amendments to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time, whatever it may be, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] is recognized for 4 minutes.

PRELIMINARY REMARKS ON THE ADOPTION OF THE RULE

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in the discussion of this rule, as I hoped to have the privilege later, if this rule be passed, to take some part in the discussion of the very grave and important constitutional questions that underlie this proposed legislation. After the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POW] spoke, I did seek a few minutes in the discussion of the rule to express my acknowledgment to him as the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Rules and the honored dean of the House for having cleared the discussion by frank admissions as to the essential nature of this legislation. His speech had, as always, the intellectual integrity that characterizes his utterances when he addresses this House.

In opening the discussion on the rule, and I quote from the manuscript of the Official Reporter, the chairman said:

This rule is a drastic rule. It is a closed rule. It is what the President wants.

This is strange language in this body. It has the merit of being brutally frank. He advises us as to the President's wishes, not as to the merits of the bill itself, but even as to the method of our procedure. I can understand the President's telling us to take a bill which the "brain trust" has spun in its spiderlike web, as an entirety or rejecting it, but I cannot understand the declaration of the Chairman of the Committee on Rules, namely, that in our manner of procedure, in the scant time given to a measure that barters away the constitutional functions of this House and the industrial liberties of the American people, even the method of discussion and the power of amendment shall be determined by the fiat of the President of the United States. The President could do no more, if he came into the House and ordered the Mace, which represents the authority of the House, to be taken away in the manner of Cromwell. He does the same in essence when, through the mouth of the Chairman of the Committee on Rules, he orders us, because he wants a bill adopted in its entirety and without opportunity of amendment, to accept from him even the conditions of the debate. [Applause.]

But, more than that, the Chairman of the Committee on Rules said this, and it is for this clarification of the issues I make my special acknowledgement:

This bill makes the President of the United States a dictator for the time being.

But he adds, to comfort us:

It is a benign dictatorship.

I hope, in the first place, that in the discussion that may follow some of the constitutional lawyers on the Democratic side of the House will tell us under what grant of power in the Constitution we can make even the President a dictator of the industrial activities of the American people. So far as the statement that this will be a benign dictatorship is concerned, that is a contradiction in terms. There is no such thing as a benign dictator [applause], and I say this with a due recognition of the charming personality and high motives of the President of the United States. You might as well talk of chaste seduction or lawful robbery or of peaceable murder as to talk of a benign dictator. It does not exist. [Applause.]

With this admission of the Chairman of the Committee on Rules that we are to be given 6 hours' discussion, with the promise that it will be a great futility, that we are to be given only one opportunity for amendment, that we are thus to give away the functions of this Congress as they have been exercised for nearly 150 years, we have reached a climax, for this rule is the most monstrous denial of representative government ever proposed to an American Congress. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] has expired.

Mr. POW. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the very kind attention of the House during the few minutes I am privileged to occupy, and I am sure my friends upon the Republican side will understand when I say that my remarks are going to be particularly addressed to my Democratic colleagues [applause], because it is evident that we can expect little support for any Democratic effort to hasten the passage of any measure proposed by the President of the United States in the effort to relieve the distress in this country from the remarks that have been made.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. No; I cannot yield. I have not time.

Now, gentlemen, let us look at this for a few moments in a sane, sober manner.

This is the administration's bill. Do not make any mistake about that. Every line of it has been written and proposed by those representing the administration, except that feature which carries the question of taxes.

There has been no more important bill proposed by the administration at this session of Congress than this bill which is now pending before us.

For my part, as a Democrat, if you please, and as an American citizen interested in the progress of our country and its recovery from the conditions which have existed during the past 3 or 4 years, I intend to give my loyal support to the President of the United States and this bill which he has proposed in his effort to relieve the country. [Applause.]

Gentlemen upon the Republican side of the aisle, as they have every time a rule is proposed, rise to denounce it and beg Democrats to join with them in their efforts to throw this bill open to amendment and possibly destroy those features of this bill which the President has proposed in the interest of the recovery of our Nation.

I say to you, as was said by the gentleman from North Carolina, I sometimes think there was a Providence which brought to the front and placed in the White House the present President of the United States at this critical period of our history. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, the people are behind the President. Do not make any mistake about that. The people expect Congress to hold up his hands and do nothing which will interfere with him in those efforts which he is making and which have already brought about a measure of success, because the condition of the country is improved now.

Why, gentlemen, what is this bill that you talk about wanting to amend? It has been approved by Mr. Green, the president of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. No; I have not the time.

It has been approved by Mr. Harriman, the president of the United States Chamber of Commerce. It has been approved by almost every farm leader and every farm organization in the country.

I want to submit to you under these circumstances if it is not your duty and mine, standing as you and I are particularly in support of the President, to stand by him in this crisis and to pass this bill which he has proposed in his message.

I appeal to you not to permit the specious arguments of the gentlemen upon that side to sway you, for I have sat here and stood here and seen them vote for rules closing amendments. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] who inveighs against all rules of this kind, is one of the men who upon his side advocated and supported the rule which denied the Membership of this House the right to propose amendments to the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill except those presented by the committee. That is what this does.

Why, they have sought to create opposition by speaking of the fact that Mr. Morgan has escaped taxation. Under what law, and by whom was it passed, and under what administration was the law passed which enabled him to evade taxes? It was passed in 1921 under the administration of President Harding. [Applause.] And I say to you upon the authority of Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee that a subcommittee is now engaged preparing an amendment to this bill when it is under consideration, which will prevent a recurrence of that sort of a situation. [Applause.]

Democrats, I ask you to give your support to the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, on the previous question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 213, nays 194, not voting 24, as follows:

Mr. BUSBY. I object.

EMERGENCY FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a concise analysis or explanation made by Mr. Morgenthau and his assistants of the Emergency Farm Loan Act on last Tuesday morning. There were a large number of Members from the Senate and House present, who indicated a desire that the statement be inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, at a meeting last Tuesday, May 23, 1933, of a large number of Congressmen with Henry Morgenthau, Jr., governor-designate of the new Farm Credit Administration, W. I. Myers, his assistant, and Paul Bestor, Farm Loan Commissioner, the various provisions of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 were discussed in detail; and at the request of those attending the meeting, I now ask unanimous consent to publish in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the details of that meeting in the form of extended remarks.

Following is a brief summary of the act, together with a detailed analysis:

The interest rate on mortgages held by the Federal land banks, made through national farm-loan associations, is reduced to a maximum of 4½ percent for 5 years, and provision is made for postponing payments on principal for that time.

Farmers whose mortgages are held by others than the land banks may obtain relief through obtaining new loans from the land banks to pay off existing mortgages, or, where the holders of these mortgages consent, they may be traded to the land banks for bonds on which the interest is guaranteed by the United States. Borrowers then obtain the benefit of the lower land-bank interest rate and any reduction in principal accomplished in the exchange.

Relief for those facing loss of their farms through debt and those who have lost them through foreclosure since July 1, 1931, is afforded in a new class of loans to be made by the Farm Loan Commissioner. These are to be in amounts up to $5,000 with interest at 5 percent and repayment in 13 years, with no payments on principal for 3 years. First and second mortgages on farms and farm property may be given as security, and the loan, plus any prior liens, may be up to 75 percent of the value of all the property pledged.

Applicants for these loans should write to the agent of the Farm Loan Commissioner in care of the Federal land bank of the district in which the property is situated. Applications for first-mortgage loans should be made to the Federal land bank in the district. A list of these banks and the States which they serve is given below.

Analysis of the act follows:

FIRST MORTGAGES THROUGH FEDERAL LAND BANKS

1. For 2 years Federal land banks are authorized to issue bonds at interest rate not to exceed 4 percent, the interest of which is guaranteed by the United States. Maximum amount to be $2,000,000,000. Proceeds to be used to make new mortgages or refinance existing mortgages.
2. In order to reduce and refinance existing farm mortgages, Federal land banks are authorized to exchange bonds for or to buy outstanding farm mortgages on best terms possible, passing savings in principal and interest on to farmer borrowers.
3. Maximum interest rate to borrowers on old and new Federal land-bank mortgages not to exceed $4\frac{1}{2}$ percent for 5-year period. Appropriation of \$15,000,000 to be used to compensate the Federal land banks for loss in interest during first year.
4. Neither old nor new borrowers from Federal land banks required to pay installments on principal of mortgages for 5-year period.
5. For 5 years Federal land banks are authorized to grant necessary extensions of payments of interest to deserving old and new borrowers. Such extensions to be financed by loans from the United States. An appropriation of $50,000,000 authorized for this purpose for ensuing fiscal year.
6. Maximum limit of Federal land-bank mortgage loans is raised from $25,000 to $50,000 on approval of Farm Loan Commissioner.
7. Federal land banks are authorized to make direct loans to farmer borrowers where no local farm-loan associations are available. Interest rate on direct loans to be one half of 1 percent higher than on loans through local associations, but rate to be reduced when borrower joins local.
8. Receivers for joint-stock land banks are authorized to borrow from Reconstruction Finance Corporation on security of receivers' certificates in order to pay taxes on real estate.
9. Applications may be made by farmer borrowers or lenders to the Federal land bank of the district.

JOINT-STOCK LAND BANKS

1. Joint-stock land banks are prohibited from issuing tax-exempt bonds or making new farm loans except in connection with refinancing of existing loans.
2. Farm Loan Commissioner is authorized to lend up to $100,000,000 to joint-stock land banks at 4 percent on security of first mortgages: provided
 - (a) Joint-stock land bank reduces interest rate on mortgages to 5 percent per annum,
 - (b) Agrees not to foreclose on mortgage for 2-year period except in unavoidable circumstances.
 These provisions will make it possible for joint-stock land banks to liquidate their affairs in an orderly manner giving consideration to farmer borrowers and to security holders.

FARM LOAN COMMISSIONER LOANS

1. Allocates $200,000,000 of Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds for loans through the Farm Loan Commissioner for the following purposes:
 - (a) To enable farmer to redeem and/or repurchase farm property lost through foreclosure.
 - (b) To reduce and refinance junior obligations.
 - (c) To provide working capital.
2. These loans to be under supervision of Farm Loan Commissioner using machinery of the Federal land banks. Loans to be made direct to farmers. No loan in excess of $5,000. Total of first and second mortgage, if any, not to exceed 75 percent of normal value of farm and farm property. Repayment in 10 equal annual installments plus interest at 5 percent but no payment on principal required for first 3 years.
3. Principal purpose of these loans to enable farmers to buy back foreclosed farms and to make small, reasonably safe, second mortgages to refinance junior liens and unsecured debts on a scale-down sufficiently drastic to permit good farmers to pay out.
4. Applications may be made by farmer borrowers to the agent of the Farm Loan Commissioner at the Federal land bank of the district.

LOANS TO DRAINAGE, LEVEE, AND IRRIGATION DISTRICTS

Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make loans not to exceed $50,000,000 to drainage, levee, irrigation, and similar districts to reduce and refinance indebtedness. Loans for period not exceeding 40 years to be secured by bonds issued by borrower which are lien on real property or on the assessment of benefits. Such loans to be made only on condition that the borrower shall reduce the indebtedness of the users of such project in amounts corresponding to reduction of its debt. No loan to be made until after appraisal has been made of the property, taking into consideration average market price of bonds over 6 months' period ending March 1, 1933, and the economic soundness of the project.

Mr. Bestor gave the following explanation of the manner in which the act is being administered:

Just 5 days after the President signed the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act, May 12, the first loan had been made from this fund. There had been appointed an agent of the Farm Loan Commissioner for each Federal land-bank district to make second-mortgage loans from this fund in his district. Any individual farmer wishing a second-mortgage loan should apply to the agent of the Farm Loan Commissioner, mailing his letter to the city in which the Federal land bank of his district is located. The cities in which the agents are located and the States in which they make loans are as follows:

Springfield, Mass.: Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, and Vermont.
Baltimore, Md.: Delaware, District of Columbia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and West Virginia.
Columbia, S. C.: Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

After the application is received by an agent of the Commissioner in proper form and if, from a preliminary consideration of the information, it is evident that the applicant and the security offered are eligible, the application will be assigned to an appraiser who will make an appraisal of the property.

When his report is received, if it is favorable, the agent considers the application and the report and advises the applicant of the approval or rejection of the application. If it is approved, the agent closes the loan.

The law states that loans may be made not in excess of 75 percent of the appraised normal value of the property. In determining such a value, of course, the agricultural earning power of the property is a principal factor. Normal value, of course, does not mean peak value nor does it mean depressed values. The appraiser must ascertain what crops a particular farm offered as security is capable of producing as well as the average yields and prices over a series of years. Average farm commodity prices from 1905 to 1914, inclusive, generally will be used as a basis for determining normal values. Of course, allowance will have to be made for reasonable adjustments in the case of products whose relative economic position has changed since that time.

Questions were then invited, to which answers were made by Mr. Bestor as follows:

Q. What is the loan limit on this second mortgage?—A. The act places a limit of $5,000 on the amount that may be loaned to any one farmer by the Farm Loan Commissioner. The Commissioner's loan, that is, the one made by his agent, together with all prior mortgages or other prior evidences of indebtedness secured by the farm property, may not exceed 75 percent of the appraised value thereof, nor can it exceed $5,000 to any one individual.

Q. Can the Commissioner take into consideration other collateral than the farm land and the buildings?—Yes. The farmer can offer not only a second mortgage on the farm real estate but also mortgages on any personal property, including livestock, tools, and crops. The interest rate, as you know, on such loans is 5 percent.

Q. How quickly does the farmer have to pay off these second-mortgage loans?—A. The act says that they must be wholly repaid within a period no greater than that for loans made under the Federal Farm Loan Act, or a maximum of 40 years, where a first or second mortgage is secured wholly upon the property and is made for the purpose of reducing and refinancing an existing mortgage. All other loans must be wholly repaid within a period of not to exceed 10 years from the date the first payment on the principal is due.

Q. When do borrowers have to start paying on the principal?—A. The act permits borrowers to pay only interest for the first 3 years. At the end of the 3-year period the borrower would start systematically to pay off the principal.

Q. When the Commissioner takes a second mortgage on the property, what agreements do you have with the holder of the first mortgage?—A. That depends upon the aggregate amount of the first and second mortgages. Where the aggregate of an existing first mortgage plus the second offered to the Commissioner does not exceed $5,000, we require the first mortgage holder to agree that during the period of 3 years he will not proceed against the mortgagor or the property for default in payment of principal unless he gets the consent of the Commissioner. Where the aggregate exceeds $5,000 the mortgagee must agree not to foreclose for any cause without consent of the Commissioner for a period of 5 years.

Q. How can a farmer use the funds that he obtains from the Commissioner?—A. They may be used in several ways: (1) To provide funds for refinancing indebtedness, either secured or unsecured, of the farmer; (2) to provide working capital for farm operations; (3) to enable the farmer to redeem or repurchase farm property owned by him prior to foreclosure which was foreclosed subsequent to July 1, 1931.

Q. Do you expect those who now hold first or second mortgages or the farmers' unsecured notes to do much scaling down?—A. Perhaps I can best illustrate that by one of the loans made during the first week after the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act was passed. This may not be typical but it illustrates the point.

We will call the farmer Jones, for that is not his name. He had a first mortgage on his property of $3,300. The agent sent an appraiser to the property after having received the application and the appraiser reported that the land and the buildings were worth $3,200. From this, of course, it is quite evident that the first-mortgage holder virtually owned the farm. Jones was able to get the mortgagor to agree to scale down the mortgage 10 percent, or $330, by offering to get him cash from the Farm Loan Commissioner's agent stationed in the bank. However, the agent could not make a loan of $3,000 on property appraised at only $3,200. Fortunately, the farmer had some personal property which the appraiser valued at $873. When this was added to the $3,200, the farmer was able to offer the agent collateral, personal and real, amounting to $4,073. Thus the agent was able to make a total loan of $3,000, or 75 percent of all the collateral put up. Since the farm was only valued at $3,200 the agent took a chattel mortgage of $411 and a lien on 42 acres of crops amounting to $189. Of course, as the chattel mortgage and crop lien is paid off it will be applied on the Commissioner's loan.

Thus the farmer secured a curtailment of his debt of $300, the rate of interest on his loan was reduced 1 percent, and he had a 13-year period in which to repay. During the first 3 years he will pay only interest. Both the farmer and the holder of the mortgage have improved their positions.

Q. Do you expect many first-mortgage loans will be made by the Commissioner's agents?—A. Undoubtedly some will be made, but where a man and his collateral qualify for a Federal land-bank loan the first-mortgage loan may be obtained from it or the farmer may be able to get a first mortgage elsewhere. I feel we are going to have plenty of applications for second-mortgage loans secured by the kind of collateral which I have already discussed.

The effort we are making is if an application comes in to the land bank and the land bank can't handle it, they refer it to the Farm Loan Commissioner's agent. And we have made arrangements that when the appraiser makes his appraisal of any loan on which there is any question as to which may make the loan, the land bank or the Commissioner's agent, that he will make two reports, one for the agent of the Farm Loan Commissioner and one for the land bank, so that whichever agency it qualifies for may act upon that application, so that in some cases it might not qualify for the land bank but would qualify for the Loan Commissioner's loans.

Q. What do you mean by farmers? Does a farmer have to be a so-called "dirt farmer"?—A. The definition of farmer in case of Farm Loan Commissioner loans is very broad. Any individual who is actually engaged in farming operations, either personally or through his agent or tenant, will qualify as a farmer; also any person the principal part of whose income is derived from farming operations qualifies. However, I would emphasize the fact that a corporation is not eligible for a loan.

FEDERAL LAND-BANK LOANS

Q. The Federal land banks have been authorized by Congress to issue during the next 2 years $2,000,000,000 of their tax-exempt bonds bearing not to exceed 4 percent interest, and the Government will guarantee the interest on these securities. Further, Congress made these bonds eligible for 15-day loans from Federal Reserve banks to member banks with the expectation that this would assure the bonds greater liquidity and a wider market. Will you tell us just how these bonds are to be used and just how quickly this new type of bond will be available to the public?—A. May I answer your last question first? The plates are being made for the new consolidated bonds, but the work is not completed. However, banks are accepting applications for loans now, and it probably will not be more than 2 or 3 weeks before the new type of bonds are available. The banks are making loans now. These bonds may be sold to the investing public to secure funds to lend on first mortgages which have acceptable security for such bond issues. The bonds may be exchanged for first mortgages in existence on May 12, 1933. Further, after a period of 1 year has elapsed, the bonds may be sold to refund outstanding issues of Federal land-bank bonds, provided the funds from such new funds are not needed to make new loans.

Q. The thought is expressed that the Federal land banks may use these new-type bonds to replace outstanding bonds, thus depriving the banks of funds with which to make loans.—A. As I have already pointed out, the land banks cannot use the new type of bonds to secure funds to purchase their own bonds for the period of 1 year from May 12, 1933. After that time, if the banks have ample funds to loan, the proceeds from the sale of this new type of farm-loan bond may be utilized to purchase their outstanding bonds.

Q. Many of the farmers of our district wish to get first-mortgage loans from the Federal land bank. In some localities national farm-loan associations are not accepting loans. Cannot farmers in those areas make applications for loans directly to the Federal land bank?—A. Yes. The amendment to the law permits a farmer in territories where national farm-loan associations are not now making new loans to apply directly to the bank, but such borrowers will have to subscribe to stock in the Federal land bank for the same amount that they would have subscribed to stock in the national farm-loan association if they had made their application to it. This amount is 5 percent of their loan.

Q. Do borrowers obtaining loans directly from the Federal land bank have to pay a higher rate of interest?—A. Yes; at least temporarily. The interest rate will be one half of 1 percent higher than that charged where loans are made through associations, but farmers who borrow directly from the bank may agree that when 10 or more borrowers have obtained direct loans from the bank aggregating not less than $20,000, residing in a locality which may be conveniently served by an association, they will unite to form an association. After such an association is formed the stock held by its members whose loans are in good standing will be canceled at par and the borrower will receive an equal amount of stock in the association. When, and if such borrowers become members of associations, the interest rate on their loans, if in good standing, will be reduced one half of 1 percent.

Q. What about fees?—A. Farmers who make application directly to the bank will pay the same initial fee to it that they would pay if their application came through a national farm-loan association.

Q. Will the size of the loan made by the banks be the same as that made by associations?—A. There will be no difference. Each is limited to 50 percent of the appraised normal value of the land for agricultural purposes plus 20 percent of the insured improvements.

Q. Will borrowers from the Federal land banks have to make application to the banks for a reduction in the interest rate?—A. No, sir. Interest maturing during the 5 years commencing July 11, this year, in connection with loans made through national farm-loan associations between May 12, 1933, and May 12, 1935, will be charged at the rate of only 4½ percent per annum. Loans made directly by the banks to borrowers will pay 5 percent per annum during the same period.

A rate of 4½ percent will be charged during the same 5-year period on loans now outstanding.

Q. What about payments on the principal?—A. No payment on the principal portion of any installment will be required during this same 5-year period if the borrower is not in default with respect to any other condition or covenant of his mortgage. By this I mean he must have paid his interest, taxes, drainage and irrigation charges if he is to secure the privilege of not paying the principal of his loan during this 5-year period.

Q. Will you illustrate just what the lower rate of interest and the privilege of not paying on the principal will mean to a farmer who has a loan of $3,000, bearing 5 percent interest.—A. He normally would pay an installment of $90 each 6 months to the bank. This installment, of course, includes both interest and principal. If he secured his loan the first year the banks opened, in 1917, of the last installment paid $57.75 went to pay interest on the unpaid principal and $32.25 was applied to the reduction of his debt. Thus, should he pay the interest only, his payment to the bank would be only $57.75, instead of the usual $90. When he resumes payment on the principal he continues to amortize, or pay off, his loan at the same rate as when he ceased such payments. For the 5-year period concerning which we are speaking the interest on his unpaid balance of the loan would be figured at the rate of 4½ percent instead of 5 percent. The average interest rate on the loans outstanding is around 5½ percent, so that there is an average of a full 1-percent curtailment in the interest rate.

Q. How does the exchange of bonds for mortgages work in the case of an insurance company, for instance?—A. If a man has a loan with an insurance company for $10,000, and the company indicates it would like to sell the mortgage, the farm is appraised by the land-bank appraiser. We will say he sets a value which would permit the bank to purchase the loan for $8,500. The farm loan association says it is good for $8,500. The company says, "We are willing to take bonds for the mortgage." The company gets the bonds; the borrower gets his mortgage loan from the Federal land bank for $8,500 at a low rate of interest. That is the procedure that would be followed in case the mortgagee takes the initiative, whether it be an insurance company, banker, or individual having the mortgage to exchange.

Q. Would the mortgagee receive bonds only or could he cash them?—A. He cannot cash bonds through the land banks. The law offers him good bonds in exchange for his mortgage. It's possible for banks if they have ample funds in cash to buy the mortgage in cash. But the provision is they may either be exchanged or purchased, and purchase has to depend upon the amount of cash available in the bank.

Q. Does the farmer who gets a loan from the bank as a result of such exchange have to subscribe for stock?—A. Yes; either in an association or the bank, to the extent of 5 percent of his loan.

Q. How are the farms appraised?—A. Just the same as if the farmer had applied for a loan and no exchange of a first mortgage for a bond were involved.

Q. If the farmer borrows directly from the bank can he later join an association and get a lower rate of interest?—A. Yes, on the same terms as if there had been no exchange of mortgage and bond involved.

Q. Does such a farmer get the benefit of the new low rate of interest and permission to pay only interest until July 11, 1938?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Does the farmer get any other benefit?—A. It depends upon whether the owner of the first mortgage to be exchanged for a Federal farm-loan bond will scale down the amount due on it. The amount of the bonds to be exchanged may not be greater than the unpaid principal of the mortgage on the date of the exchange, or 50 percent of the normal value of the land mortgaged and 20 percent of the value of the permanent insured improvements thereon, as determined by a land-bank appraiser, whichever is the smaller. If the unpaid principal is too large, it will have to be scaled down if an exchange is made. However, that is up to the holder of the mortgage. The bank will tell him how much it will loan on the property.

Q. What is to be done about scaling down of taxes and assessments on public-improvement districts, such as irrigation, drainage, and levee districts?—A. That is handled by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. A fund of $50,000,000 was made available to be loaned to such districts to refinance their projects by purchasing their depreciated securities outstanding. Any reduction in indebtedness of such districts so obtained must be passed on pro rata to the farm owners in such areas. Loans may be made only when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is convinced of the economic soundness of the projects.

Q. Does this apply to private projects?—A. No; only to public-improvement districts.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks that I made this morning by including the full text for the authority to Hitler as a dictator, a part of which I read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY BILL

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5755) to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LOZIER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the time is to be divided equally, 3 hours to be controlled by myself and 3 hours to be controlled by the ranking minority Member on the Republican side, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY]. I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge has yielded this time to me in order that I may make a statement. Title I of this bill proposes what amounts, in the view of the Committee on the Judiciary, to a suspension of the antitrust law. It is recognized by gentlemen familiar with legislative history in this House that the subject of the antitrust law and kindred laws has fallen as a matter of jurisdiction to the Committee on the Judiciary. To be candid with the Chair and the other Members of the House, it was contemplated that we would test the jurisdiction of this committee with reference, at least, to title I of the bill; but we have reached the understanding that, in this instance, we will not test the jurisdiction with regard to title I, provided it is understood, and I understand from the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge that it is so understood, that our yielding to the committee in charge of this bill, jurisdiction with reference to the antitrust law and kindred legislative propositions shall not be regarded as a precedent, and shall not, insofar as this action is concerned, affect the question of jurisdiction as between the Judiciary Committee and other committees with reference to the general subject of legislation dealing with antitrust legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. COX. The time for debate upon the bill is fixed by the rule at 6 hours, to be divided equally between the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY]. May I inquire at this time as to how that time is to be divided as between gentlemen who are for the pending measure and those who are against it?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, replying to the inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia, so far as is known to me as chairman of the committee, there was no understanding. I have quite a number of requests for time from members of the committee. I feel that I should give consideration to those requests. My purpose is to allot the time as fairly as I can among the Members of the House who desire to speak on the bill. I have requests for much more time than it is possible for me to accommodate. If I begin to show a preference in the matter, I fear that I should subject myself to very severe criticism from other Members of the House, as much as I should like to accommodate the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman mean by that that he does not intend to recognize the right of the opposition to the bill and to divide the time equally with it?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not know that I am familiar enough with parliamentary usage in the House and the custom in connection with it to understand what I should do.

Mr. COX. What does the gentleman think is fair? He is a fair man.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I must do as far as I can what in the judgment of the House would be fair. That matter should have been determined in the Rules Committee.

Mr. COX. Oh, the Rules Committee did not want to cast such a reflection upon the gentleman who is the chairman of this great committee.

Mr. DOUGHTON. It would be no reflection to say how the time should be divided.

Mr. COX. Let me come to the point that I have in mind. The gentleman understands the agreement had with me yesterday as to the time that I would have.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I understand and recall distinctly that I myself agreed to yield the gentleman 20 minutes, and he would not state that I went any further?

Mr. COX. No; and the gentleman in control of the time on the Republican side yielded me 20 minutes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I think he agreed to or there was some such understanding, but that is a matter that is between the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman indulge me to the point of making an inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to see if it is expected that I am to use 20 minutes?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Is this coming out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. It is all out of the time of the gentleman from North Carolina. He has been recognized.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts give attention to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. TREADWAY. I should be very glad to answer the gentleman in the time of the chairman of the committee. Perhaps it is well to say just a word in respect to the reference the gentleman from Georgia is making. Yesterday afternoon I was called in conference by him and the chairman of the committee, and the gentleman from Georgia made the request for 40 minutes' time. The chairman of the committee asked me if in view of the fact that the gentleman from Georgia is a member of the Committee on Rules I would be willing to concede part of the Republican time to him.

Mr. COX. Yes; and also in view of the fact that I was instrumental in having the time increased from 4 hours to 6 hours, and the gentleman was so informed.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not know how the extra time came about. Of course, if the gentleman says that he was instrumental in having it increased 2 hours, we accept that statement from him.

Later on I found there was such a strong demand for time on the Republican side, exhausting certainly more than the hour in addition to my 2 hours of time, that I consulted with the gentleman from North Carolina, my chairman, and we reached an understanding that I was to yield to Republicans, for and against the bill, as the case might be, and the gentleman from North Carolina was to yield to Democrats, for or against, as the case might be; and we laid that matter before the gentleman from Georgia. I told the gentleman frankly, as I am willing to tell the House, that as far as this talk of yesterday was concerned, I had agreed to yield 20 minutes, but in view of the circumstances that have since arisen among my Republican colleagues, I wanted to make an even swap, which is a good Yankee way of doing, and I would take care of another gentleman on this side of the House wanting more time than most Members did, in order to make a very learned constitutional discussion. Therefore I expect to yield more time to the gentleman I have in mind, a Republican Member, than to any other Republican.

I think that is a fair explanation of where I expect to use my time. I have declined in several instances to yield time to Democrats who are against the bill. Why should I favor one Democrat over another? I prefer to favor Republicans.

Mr. COX. Is the gentleman prepared to live up to his agreement with me and the chairman of the committee?

Mr. TREADWAY. I think the gentleman realizes the situation I am in and that I went to him early this morning and explained the situation, that he must go to the gentleman from North Carolina to secure his time.

Mr. COX. In view of the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, will the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] be liberal and agree that I may have 40 minutes, in view of the fact, as the gentleman knows, that I was responsible for increasing the time from 4 to 6 hours in order that I might have time to debate the matter?

Mr. DOUGHTON. As far as the gentleman from North Carolina is concerned, he made no such request that the time be extended, and I have to deal with this under the circumstances as they exist today and not what transpired 2 or 3 days ago, but if I can find time, in justice to the other Members of the House, I will be glad to yield that much time to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman not feel that he owes something to the opposition to this bill?

Regular order was demanded.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, this bill now under consideration is one of the major pieces of legislation recommended by the administration. In my opinion, it is one of the most, if not the most important piece of legislation that will come before this Congress, or that has come before the Congress.

We held quite extended hearings on the bill. A number of witnesses, representing practically every business, industry, and occupation in the entire country, appeared before our committee. As near as I recall, not a single witness testified in opposition to this measure.

This bill, as I understand, is favored or supported by industry, by agriculture, and by labor. Those three powerful organizations in this country are all behind this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, on yesterday morning I arranged to have placed in the mail box of each Member of the House copies of this bill and the report, in order that each Member might have an opportunity before the bill was taken up for consideration today to read the bill and read the report and familiarize himself or herself with the provisions of the bill. That report is full and complete, a complete analysis and explanation of the provisions of this bill. Therefore I feel it is unnecessary for me to take the brief time I shall occupy to explain the bill, and I would suggest to any Member of the House who is not fully satisfied as to the provisions of the bill and just what it provides for that he read that report between now and the time the vote is taken.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I shall request that I may complete my statement without interruption. After I am through, if there are any questions I can answer, I shall be glad to do so. It is my desire to make a consecutive and connected statement in connection with the bill, and in order to do so I again request that I be not interrupted.

There exists a most pressing need for the legislation now under consideration. This need is so acute and distressing that it constitutes our major problem. All legislation so far enacted by this extraordinary session of the Congress is but preliminary to this measure and without it may be of little immediate benefit. The wholesome effects of other emergency measures already enacted are quite apparent and are reflected in the rise in prices and the return of confidence everywhere, but the prime need of millions of our citizens today is a job, and this bill undertakes to make that a certainty.

This measure is an essential part of the plan looking toward economic and industrial rehabilitation and recovery. It is the keystone in the arch of that structure. It provides means for putting our unemployed to work for a living wage and under wholesome conditions and at the same time guarantees equal opportunity to those supplying the jobs, in that the Government will cooperate with industry in maintaining standards of competition in keeping with equity and justice. It charts a middle course between the ruinous or complete monopoly in vogue prior to the enactment of the Sherman antitrust law and the era of unfair competition that now has a strangle hold upon business. It sets up flexible machinery which the President may use to prevent monopoly on the one hand and ruinous competition on the other. Flexible remedies are always necessary in emergencies, and no one will dispute that conditions are now critical and dangerous. In fact, conditions are such that the very existence of government itself is threatened. The central feature of the bill is to maintain fair competition without granting monopoly and to provide fair standards of labor and working conditions. It seeks to apply the principle of the Golden Rule to business and industry and also to provide a stimulant that will promote courage, confidence, and hope.

It is designed to promote and accelerate industrial recovery throughout the manifold branches of our business structure and to provide gainful employment once more to the millions of our people now tragically idle. In the words of the President, it is a great "cooperative movement" throughout all industry, and intended to remove the fetters and restrictions from legitimate business.

Another important feature of the measure is that the Government pledges itself to go forward with its own vast program of public works along with the States and municipalities. This simultaneous activity on the part of private industry and public enterprises should bring a business revival to every industry, enterprise, and occupation. The monumental program of public works contemplated should and will restore confidence to the faltering business public by demonstrating that the Government itself has confidence in its program and will take the lead in the effort to put it into effect. Then as private industry falls in line our people will emerge happily from the years of economic blight, pestilence, and stagnation and will go forth with a new hope and a new confidence that our Government has not lost its power to render aid in a great crisis. The patriotic and social standards of former days will again be hoisted in the American home and the agitators and destructionists who have come to us in the wake of the greatest economic scourge in our history will pass from the scene. Such ideal conditions cannot come, however, until there is work for the unemployed, a home for every family, and a fair profit for every legitimate business enterprise, and that is what is expected from this bill and its companion measures. All these are united in one great plan to repair and rebuild our tottering economic structure, the very foundations of which have been shaken and almost shattered.

It was the predominant view of the 40 or more witnesses who appeared before our committee during its consideration of this bill that conditions are such as to demand a drastic remedy, and that this bill will have the salutary effect desired. It is significant that both capital and labor share this view, as was evidenced by the testimony given by President Harriman, of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and by President Green, of the American Federation of Labor. Mr. Harriman gives assurance that already, in advance of the enactment of this legislation, some of the branches of industry, such as steel, automotive, textile, oil, and lumber industries have agreed upon tentative codes of fair competition, and that as a concomitant of such agreements the wages of some 10,000,000 workers will be increased, furthering a movement already started to restore the buying power of the masses.

Mr. Harriman also said that this was the most important piece of legislation that had been before this Congress. He said that it was not only important but absolutely necessary in connection with the farm-relief measure, of which this is a companion measure, to carry out the purposes for which it was intended.

I want to read from the testimony of Mr. Harriman, because he knows as much about American business and American industry and is as well informed and as well qualified to speak for industry as any living man in America today.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BUSBY. May I ask who Mr. Harriman is?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Did the gentleman never hear of him before?

Mr. BUSBY. Well, I know one Harriman, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is the gentleman.

Mr. BUSBY. And this is their bill, is it not?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No, sir. This is not their bill that I know of. I understand that business generally throughout the United States endorses the bill, so does labor, and so does agriculture. If it is Mr. Harriman's bill, it is Mr. Green's bill and the farmers' bill. In fact, I consider it the people's bill.

Mr. BUSBY. I would like to know where the people's bill is in this thing.

Mr. DOUGHTON. It is right in the very heart of this bill from first to last.

Those who do not believe in this bill, those who cannot conscientiously support it, have the constitutional right to oppose and to vote against it. If they think it is a good bill, they will have the opportunity to support it.

I shall now read from the testimony offered by Mr. Harriman.

Mr. Harriman, after discussing the several other bills that have been passed or are under way as a part of the program for rehabilitation, mentions the farm bill as a companion bill to the measure under consideration and says:

Now, there are two bills that are distinctly inflationary of labor, and they are companion bills. I refer to the so-called "farm bill", which, I believe, is equally an industrial bill, and which, I believe, is going to result in higher prices for farm products—and that means greater purchasing power for the farmer to spend for the purchase of goods that are made in the factories in the cities—and this bill that is now before you. But let me say frankly that I do not believe the farm bill will be successful unless you pass this bill as an accompaniment to it; for, obviously, if wages are not raised, if dividends are not resumed, and if purchasing power in the city remains at the present level, the city man cannot pay the higher prices that the farmer rightfully demands for his products.

Mr. Harriman also stated that the purchasing power of the American people had dropped from $84,000,000,000 to $40,000,000,000, and that, if the present rate of descent continued, next year it would not be over $30,000,000,000. So you can see what an alarming situation we are in.

It is the loss of this buying power that has produced and is prolonging the world's worst depression.

It should be borne in mind also that, regardless of what may be done toward expansion of the currency, as a Treasury operation, the pending program, involving billions of dollars, will be inflationary in its effect. This is important because industry and those connected with it are the first to experience the benefits of any inflationary movement. This being true, then the Government, through the operation of this measure, will make it possible for those engaged in and connected with industry to pay the increased taxes carried by the bill much more easily than they are now paying the present taxes, which are lower than those being paid in Great Britain and other countries.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we know that to make possible the proper functioning of the act it is necessary that the Government incur an obligation of gigantic proportions, aggregating $3,300,000,000, and to liquidate which will require an additional annual revenue of $220,000,000. To meet this demand it is necessary that we find sources of additional revenue at a time when it is highly desirable to reduce rather than to increase our taxes. However, this vast sum is not to be thrown away but is to be invested by the United States as earnest money, evidencing the faith of our Government in its own remedies and its readiness to back them with its resources. I shall now discuss briefly these tax provisions.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman just made the statement that Mr. Green had expressed the opinion that 6,000,000 men would be put to work directly.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I think that is correct.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Six million men put to work directly at an average wage of $1,000 a year would mean $6,000,000,000. How long is it expected these men will be employed under the plan set up in this bill?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I think the gentleman from North Carolina inadvertently stated the number of men directly employed as 6,000,000. As I recall the testimony it was that 6,000,000 men, directly and indirectly, would be given employment.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That may be correct but I think it was testified before our committee that the practical effect of this legislation would be to put 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 men to work.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. William Green, the president of the American Federation of Labor, made the direct and specific statement that 6,000,000 will be put back into employment through the operation of this measure within a short time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I thought I was correct in my statement. I refreshed my recollection on this point this morning.

Three additional taxes are proposed in section 208 to provide the annual revenue necessary to the operation of the act. These have been selected with two ends in view: First, to distribute the added burden as broadly as possible, but only upon those able to pay; second, to select only those sources that are certain in productivity, in order that the credit of the Government may be maintained.

Now, increase of taxes is always a painful operation. There is not much trouble about an operation until the pain and blood starts, and then, of course, the trouble begins.

These additional taxes are:

First. An increase in the rate of normal income taxes on the first $4,000 of net income from the present 4 percent rate to 6 percent. The normal rate on the excess over $4,000 is raised from 8 percent to 10 percent. These increases will bring in about $46,000,000 annually.

Second. Cash dividends received from the stock of domestic corporations have been made subject to the normal tax. At present, such income is exempt from the normal tax and is only reached by the surtax. This additional tax should yield about $83,000,000 annually.

Third. The tax on gasoline is increased three fourths of a cent per gallon, bringing the total tax on this commodity up to $1\frac{3}{4}$ of a cent on the gallon. This should result in added revenue of about \$92,000,000 annually.

Several taxes were suggested and your committee gave careful consideration to these suggestions. It was necessary in this emergency legislation, this temporary legislation, to provide additional taxes, but these taxes will be temporary. It is the purpose of the administration and it will be the purpose of your committee, and I know it will be the purpose of Congress to repeal these taxes just as soon as business recovers and industry revives, and the ordinary sources of taxation are sufficient to support the recurring expenses of the Government.

I will discuss briefly the effects of these taxes, with the reasons for their selection by your committee. Before doing this, however, I desire to say that it is a very difficult and troublesome task to select new taxes to be imposed upon an already overtaxed public. I feel, however, that in this instance the ends will amply justify the means and that the benefits that will flow from the operation of this law will be many times greater than the burden temporarily imposed.

First. The increase in normal income-tax rates: The effect of raising these rates from 4 percent and 8 percent, respectively, to 6 percent and 10 percent can best be seen by a comparison of the present tax with the proposed tax on certain incomes. For convenience we will take the case of a married man with no dependents. Under the present law if he has a net income of $3,000 he pays a tax of $20 annually, while under the proposed bill he would pay $30. If his income is $5,000 net, he now pays $100, while under the pending bill he would pay $150. In like manner the tax on an income of $10,000 will be increased from $480 to $630 and on one of $50,000 from $8,600 to $9,550, and so on, affecting all taxpayers in proper proportion, whether their incomes are large or small. These increases are considerable, but it is believed that they can well be borne, especially so in view of the fact that many benefits will flow to such taxpayers from the general provisions of the measure.

Second. Subjecting dividends to the normal tax rate: This plan has been proposed heretofore, but did not receive the sanction of both branches of the Congress. Last year the House approved a similar plan, but it was eliminated in the Senate.

Under the existing laws a man with a net income of $6,000 pays no Federal tax if his income is all from dividends. Under the pending bill he will pay a tax of $240, which is exactly the amount that will be paid by a man with a salary of $6,000.

In spite of the many theoretical arguments about double taxation, when we consider the matter from a practical standpoint, why has not a man with a capital of $100,000, which yields him $6,000 a year in dividends, just as much ability to pay a tax thereon as a man with a salary of $6,000 a year and no capital? Then under this bill the man with the capital will have an opportunity to earn still more on his investment.

At present a man with an income of $50,000 annually from dividends pays a tax of only $4,950, as compared with a tax of $8,600 paid by a man with the same income from salary. Under the pending bill, after taking into consideration the increases in normal rates, each person will pay the same—$9,550. I believe this is fair. Certainly there should be no objection to it during the present emergency.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. MARSHALL. The Ways and Means Committee have been laboring on the proposition of how to raise $220,000,000, which I understand is to be set up as an interest and sinking fund.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is correct.

Mr. MARSHALL. Are we to infer from that that this would take care of interest and the redemption of this borrowed money? What I should like to know, but have not been able to find out from any member of the Ways and Means Committee that I have asked, is how much of this $3,300,000,000 is going to be loaned and how much of it is going to be given away. If it is going to be given away, we do not need the $220,000,000.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for me to reply to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman doubtless has observed the provision of the bill which authorizes a grant, which was interpreted as a gift, of 30 percent of any project that may be submitted for consideration. Of course, it is impossible to know just how this 30-percent limitation will be applied to the entire amount involved, and it cannot be definitely figured.

Mr. MARSHALL. If 30 percent is to be granted, $220,000,000 would not be needed to take care of the interest and sinking fund, would it?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. No; but the 30 percent is only the amount of the grant by the Government. Then the municipality or the agency to which the grant or gift is made has the right to borrow the other 70 percent.

The entire amount has to be funded, of course, and sinking-fund and interest charges apply to it all.

Mr. MARSHALL. Do I understand, then, that the 30 percent is all that is to be given away?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That is the grant; yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In that connection, of course, while you will have loans made, these loans are to be repaid over a certain period of time; but, for instance, the yields from the loans are not so definite and certain that you could create your amortization fund from the repayments.

Mr. MARSHALL. In other words, then, neither the committee nor anyone else knows how much of this you will ever get back, and that is the reason for the interest and sinking fund.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It is the purpose that every dollar that is loaned, of course, is expected to be repaid. I am certain the gentleman would not think any other policy would be adopted.

Mr. McCLINTIC and Mr. BLANCHARD rose.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I want to clear up, if I can, the term "grant." It is my understanding, as a member of the committee, that when the word "grant" was used with respect to the money that was to be allocated for the construction of roads, the entire amount would be furnished by the Government and no part of it would be reimbursed.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. There is no loan feature in connection with the road appropriation.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I was just wondering whether the RECORD should show that it is the intention of this legislation to give 30 percent to any project, or whether there is a loan on the part of the Government so that the municipality or other subdivision of government could get 70 percent, and have this in addition, with the thought that it should be repaid.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. If the gentleman will turn to page 21 of the hearings he will see that I asked that specific question of Mr. Douglas, Director of the Budget, who was appearing in support of this bill and was explaining it. I asked Mr. Douglas this question:

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I should like to have your interpretation of the term "grant."

Mr. DOUGLAS. A grant is an outright grant, requiring no repayment.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Is it an outright grant or gift?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; an outright grant or gift.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Since the gentleman has the record before him, would he mind informing the House how the committee arrived at the figure of $3,300,000,000 to be appropriated? Did the gentleman's committee have before it the projects intended to be included and the estimated cost of them, from a consideration of which they arrived at a determination of the figure of $3,300,000,000?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. If the chairman will yield to me a moment, I may say that I propounded exactly the same question to Mr. Douglas, and his reply was that a careful survey had been made throughout the country, and the result of it showed that there were useful and needful public-work activities throughout the country on the part of States, municipalities, and so forth, which aggregated about $2,000,000,000, and then the survey further showed that Federal public works could profitably be undertaken to the extent of about $1,300,000,000, and the aggregate of these two estimates makes up the $3,300,000,000.

Mr. COX. I presume the gentleman's committee had before it these surveys to which the gentleman refers; and if this is true, would the gentleman mind inserting them in the Record for the information and benefit of the House?

Mr. DOUGHTON. In this connection, if the gentleman has read the message of the President, which was read from the desk here, he knows that the President himself stated that a careful survey had been made. The President knows what he is talking about when he refers to a survey, and I am sure had it made by someone who is competent. He said that a thorough and careful survey had been made, and it was his opinion and judgment that $3,300,000,000 is necessary for this program of rehabilitation. The gentleman will find that in the message of the President of the United States.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think, Mr. Chairman, this can be cleared up very easily by reading two lines from the President's message to Congress.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is what I was referring to.

Mr. TREADWAY. The President said, and I am quoting from the President's message on the first page of the committee report:

A careful survey convinces me that approximately $3,300,000,000 can be invested in useful and necessary public construction, and at the same time put the largest possible number of people to work.

Mr. DOUGHTON. When interrupted, I had reached the gasoline tax, against which there seems to be more widespread and universal objection or complaint, if propaganda is evidence of the feeling of the country, than any other tax that we have proposed in this bill.

As I understand, the gentlemen of the minority will offer a motion to recommit proposing to substitute a general manufacturers' sales tax in lieu of the taxes or part of the taxes we have proposed, and I violate no confidence in saying that in our committee it appeared that probably the alternative to a tax on gasoline would be a manufacturers' sales tax.

I agreed to this tax very reluctantly. I voted against the present revenue bill which was enacted at the last session of the Congress, and one of the reasons was that it contained a gasoline tax. I have never thought it was a tax which should be used except in an emergency such as now exists; but if we take into consideration that the alternative would be a sales tax which would apply to gasoline, to automobiles, to accessories and parts, tires and tubes, to trucks, to tractors, and to everything that gasoline is used in connection with, and in addition would apply to every article in the home and on the farm and is a tax that would be paid by the gasoline users, I am sure we will realize that if a sales tax were adopted in lieu of the tax of three quarters of a cent on gasoline, it would be more than 10 times as burdensome, more than 10 times as great, and more than 10 times as harsh as a three fourths of a cent tax on gasoline.

Oh, they say, you are pyramiding this gasoline tax and it is a sales tax. Well, it is not a sales tax that covers every article used in the home and on the farm. Those who are complaining of the gasoline tax must keep in mind that a sales tax is the alternative, and as between the two this gasoline tax would be so negligible as not to admit of comparison in its burdens with a general sales tax.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman is speaking of the gasoline tax. When that matter was before the House we adopted a rider or amendment that transferred the electrical-energy tax from the consumer to the producer. What is the purpose of the committee with reference to that?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Has the gentleman read the report on the bill?

Mr. GIBSON. I have; yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Does the gentleman not understand it?

Mr. GIBSON. Not exactly.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Let me say to the gentleman from Vermont that I made a statement this morning in the discussion on the rule that the committee would offer an amendment accomplishing that same thing. In other words, they would offer an amendment similar to the Whittington amendment.

Mr. GIBSON. I thank the gentleman. I am sorry I was not present when he made the statement this morning.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. I want to say, in reference to this matter, that for 2 weeks there has been a deadlock between the two bodies on that item and the members of the Ways and Means Committee have been extremely busy with this legislation. But an amendment was agreed upon this morning covering the electrical-energy tax just as the House passed it originally.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. In connection with the gasoline tax, the House passed the amendment, and it is now in conference, reducing the postage on local letters from 3 cents to 2 cents. May I ask if the committee has made provision for that?

Mr. DOUGHTON. There was no such understanding reached by the committee. We have full faith that an agreement will be reached on the bill now in conference between the Senate and the House.

Mr. TREADWAY. Does not the gentleman think it would save time to tell the gentleman from Mississippi that the committee instructed its experts to draft and put in proper form an amendment for that purpose? It is a pretty complicated thing to take an item out of a conference report and reword it, and that is what we have asked the experts to do between now and tomorrow morning.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That statement was made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] this morning.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman if there is any disagreement between the House and the Senate in respect to the postal reduction?

Mr. DOUGHTON. None at all.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Massachusetts does not mean to say that the committee contemplates any amendment with reference to the postal rates? The amendment to which the gentleman refers is the one dealing with electrical energy. Then there will be another amendment in regard to net losses that will wipe out and eliminate the carry-over of 1 year in individual, partnership, and corporate income; but there has been no agreement yet in respect to an amendment that will affect postal rates.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. My question was, Is it not contemplated that before this bill shall finally pass that the provisions of this act will be so modified that the reduced stamp taxes will be embodied in the current legislation, inasmuch as it has not been brought forward either in the bill or in the suggestions made?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I think it is unfair to interrupt the chairman's regular address in relation to matters not actually in the bill. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] has been assured by all of us that the electrical-energy matter is being taken care of and that is all that ought to be brought up at the present time. Let us do one thing at a time and listen to the chairman's address.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? There are some things, I think, which should be clarified about title I.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Has the gentleman read the report?

Mr. CELLER. Yes; but there are some matters that ought to be cleared up. For example, can there be different codes of practice for one given industry in different parts of the country? For instance, take the textile industry.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] to reply to that question as he is a lawyer.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, that question was submitted to Mr. Douglas, to Senator Wagner, to Mr. Richberg, and in each instance they said positively that they could have different codes as affecting the same industry in different sections of the country.

Mr. CELLER. What is meant by the language?—

The President may differentiate according to the experience and skill of the employees affected in accordance with the locality of employment.

What is meant by "locality of employment"?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The very thing, as I understand it, to which the gentleman directed his former inquiry. That is, the geography of the country, where different business conditions exist.

Mr. CELLER. Is there any question but that these agreements that may be entered into by trade groups may provide for the fixing of prices?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not understand the question.

Mr. CELLER. Can the textile industry get together or the tanners get together or the manufacturers of shoes get together and under this agreement that is spoken of in title I fix the prices of their commodities?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not find anything in here in which that is specifically authorized. As a matter of fact, it affects the hours of labor, minimum pay, and the working conditions in the particular industry. They are required to be in the voluntary and unlimited code as well as in the limited code.

Mr. CELLER. There is nothing in the bill which says that you cannot by these agreements fix prices, and, therefore, is the inference to be drawn that prices may be fixed?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I cannot yield further.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me to ask a question?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. COX. Is the gentleman in a position to deny that this is a price-fixing scheme? Under the provisions of the bill, cannot these industries that enter into these agreements fix the prices of their commodities?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As I read this bill, under the code of fair competition, whether it be voluntary or involuntary, the agreements made among the labor industries or among the industrial concerns, deal with the maximum hours of labor, the minimum pay, and the working conditions. These factors enter into the completed cost of the article, but, so far as the bill being a price-fixing bill, I do not regard it as such.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. It has all to be approved by the President of the United States.

Mr. CELLER. Personally, I believe that the dissatisfaction of the antitrust decisions of the Supreme Court has always been to the effect that there was inability to arrange something akin to price fixing, and unless you have some price fixing, you will have the same objection to this bill that the manufacturers throughout the country are leveling against the interpretation by the Supreme Court of the Sherman Act. You must have price fixing, otherwise you destroy the purpose of the bill.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In reply to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], I recall in the hearings that we had Mr. Harriman, the president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, before us, and I brought up that particular question. It was stated by him and agreed to, I think, and understood by the committee that whatever price fixing or rules or regulations are brought into this matter are entirely under the direct control of the President of the United States, and we give him authority through this administrator to regulate this matter so that it will not affect adversely the interest of the people but will also help industry.

Mr. COX. Is not that price fixed temporarily?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. To whatever extent it is granted.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. I hope the members of the committee will be candid about this matter. I think they ought to admit that there is a possibility and a probability that these agreements might fix prices, but they must be approved at first hand by the President of the United States. That is the way I read this bill. There is nothing short of that.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. You may have an increase in the commodity price that a fair price for the product might be secured. If you are going to increase labor costs on a fair competitive basis, you may have some increase in the price in a given product. It may eliminate cutthroat competition. You may be able to put men back to work who cannot work now because of cutthroat competition, but I maintain there is nothing in this bill to say that it is a price-fixing bill, as such.

Mr. CELLER. If we can cut out the cutthroat competition by fixing the price, let us do it. I am heartily in favor of it.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further. It is unjust to other members of the committee who desire time to speak on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman yields to his colleagues, the Chair cannot interfere. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Third, the increased tax on gasoline. This tax was reluctantly imposed. However, the fact that it has been imposed should not be held as indicating that the Federal Government intends to continue in this field. It is expected that eventually this source can be left exclusively to the States. Only the exigencies of the present justify this further temporary levy on gasoline. Moreover, it should be remembered that all the taxing provisions of the bill are only temporary and will be removed as soon as the increased revenues of the Government will permit, and there is no doubt in my mind that as a result of the operation of the act business will be so revived that no real burden from the tax provisions will ever be felt by the people and that increased revenues to the Government as a direct result of the operations provided for in the bill will many times offset the taxes it carries.

If, as some have suggested, there is serious objection to the further pyramiding of taxes on gasoline, it should be remembered that no industry has more to gain from the operation of this measure, with its codes of fair practice, than has the now demoralized and helpless oil industry.

There has been suggested as an alternative tax program a manufacturers' sales tax, the chief merit of which is said to be that it would have a wider spread and therefore would inflict a minimum of pain and resentment. It is true that a general sales tax would be somewhat concealed, as it would be incorporated in an insidious system and therefore difficult of abandonment in the future. But such a tax falls with equal force upon people with part-time employment or no employment at all. It would weigh heavily on those not immediately benefited by the inauguration of a recovery program. Those who will benefit most by the measure should be prompted by their sense of fairness as well as their self-interest to assume the heaviest portion of the burden; and since it is an investment that should bring dividends in the way of benefits far in excess of the taxes they will pay, they should be reconciled to the tax burden involved.

Those who are connected with the motor industry should reflect that a general sales tax would not only reach gasoline, but the automobile, the truck, the tractor, parts and accessories, and thus would by far exceed the tax on gasoline. It would also attach to every article consumed on the farm or in the home. It is true that those who favor a general sales tax seem to think it would be helpful to them in getting it adopted, to exempt food, clothing, and medicine. At heart they, in fact, believe in no exemptions. What justification is there in exempting food and tax the stove it is cooked on, the linen and the table from which it is eaten, the knives, forks, spoons, and dishes; the bedding and all the furniture in the home and every farm implement used in producing the food?

It would also tax every board and nail and every brick and every ounce of cement going into the home—all vital necessities in human existence. We might just as well have a sales tax without exemptions and at a lower rate. It would be preferable to one with a high rate and few exemptions. The proffered exemption of food and clothing is nothing but a lure to deceive the people.

Four hundred million dollars specified in this bill is to be expended on road construction and road improvement, not only on the great through highways, but also on the secondary roads and market roads. Four hundred million dollars is to be expended, designated or specified in this bill, which will directly more than reimburse those who pay the taxes on gasoline.

Those who seem to think that a general sales tax would be more acceptable than the small increase on gasoline should consider the provisions of section 204 of this bill, which provide for the spending of as much as $400,000,000 on Federal-aid highway systems and extensions thereof into and through municipalities and the removal of the hazards of highway traffic. This is extended to lateral or feeder roads, and the funds so expended need not be matched by the States. The benefits that will inure to the motor industry and to the oil industry from the operation of this feature of the measure alone will be manifold, and in fact will exceed many times the amount of the tax that will be paid on gasoline. So there can be no just grounds for complaint against this emergency tax for the purposes for which it is levied.

Now, in conclusion, ladies and gentlemen, I desire to emphasize this fact: This is an administration measure. The President has requested its enactment and he considers it necessary in carrying forward his great relief and rehabilitation program. Under his wise and courageous leadership an almost miraculous change has already occurred. This phenomenal revival and recovery, now apparent on every hand, was beyond our fondest expectations a short while ago. From every section of the country are coming the welcome tidings of better business, better times. Renewed hope and confidence have superseded gloom and despair and, my friends, I feel that anyone who tries to deny the President this essential measure—this weapon of warfare on the economic scourge from which we have suffered so long—is assuming a terrible responsibility. The chatter and hair-splitting about the Constitution will find little sympathy among the American people. They trust our President; they know he has started somewhere and is getting somewhere. He is walking a tightrope; and the one who shakes that rope, the one who tries to defeat the wise thought and plans of the President, will discover that the sentiment of the American people will severely condemn such course.

Let us continue to go forward and complete the entire program. Let us look to ourselves that we lose not the things that have been wrought, but receive the full reward by completing in letter and spirit the President's entire program. [Applause.]

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the bill. I ask unanimous consent to have my remarks extended in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, on May 17 the President sent a message to Congress asking for a temporary tax levy to pay the bonds which is intended shall be issued for the purpose of raising $3,300,000,000 for reemployment of our citizens. Among other things the President's message says:

The taxes to be imposed are for the purpose of providing reemployment for our citizens. Provision should be made for their reduction or elimination; first, as fast as increasing revenues from improving business become available to replace them; second, whenever the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, now pending before the States, shall have been ratified and the repeal of the Volstead Act effected. The pre-prohibition revenue laws would then automatically go into effect and yield enough wholly to eliminate these temporary reemployment taxes.

It is not my desire to take issue with our President, who is a sincere patriot striving to restore our country to prosperity; but I feel it is my duty to present what I deem to be important facts concerning this measure. I am anxious to see all our unemployed citizens restored to profitable employment, and I believe this session of Congress has already passed measures which will accomplish this by providing for expansion in the circulation of money. It is as impossible for business to exist without sufficient circulation of money as it is for the human body to live without sufficient circulation of blood; therefore when the circulation of money is stopped business is bound to die. The awful business depression now prevailing is caused for want of sufficient money in circulation. Congress has provided for this, and all that is necessary to bring about reemployment of all citizens is to put into effect the measures which Congress has enacted for this purpose. Proper circulation of money will revive all business, and this will aid people who are now idle in securing profitable employment. Therefore it is unnecessary to issue interest-bearing bonds to bring relief to the people. The interest on such bonds would cost the people more than $100,000,000 annually, besides the extra burden of taxes in order to secure money with which to pay these bonds.

It is said if the eighteenth amendment is repealed the taxes derived from the liquor traffic would be sufficient to pay the bonds issued for the purpose of securing money for the reemployment of our citizens. This statement may be correct. If the eighteenth amendment is repealed, the taxes paid by the liquor traffic may bring enough revenue into the United States Treasury to pay the bonds, but the records will show when business is good much more revenue is paid into the United States Treasury since the adoption of the eighteenth amendment than prior thereto. In the year 1914 the liquor traffic was highly prosperous. The total revenue of the United States Government for that year was $1,045,628,955, while in 1929, which was the beginning of the present depression, the revenue was $4,036,219,000, a gain of about 400 percent under national prohibition of the revenue of the United States. That is not all. The bank deposits increased from 22 billions to 40 billions, in savings banks from 9 to 28 billions. The national income increased from 36 billions to 70 billions. The average income per capita increased from $360 to $562. This is positive proof that national prohibition is not the cause of the depression as the advocates of repeal would have us believe. It is also a glaring fact the "wet" nations of Europe have suffered much more from the depression than has the United States. All of which positively proves if our Government will bring back prosperity by correcting our money system, national prohibition will aid 400 percent more in sustaining the prosperity than will the liquor traffic. Therefore, from a financial standpoint alone, it would be a crime to repeal the eighteenth amendment. This alone is sufficient reason for retaining national prohibition for all time, but there are many, a great many, good and sufficient reasons why the eighteenth amendment should not be repealed. Prohibition is based on the fact that intoxicating liquor is exceedingly harmful and has been a menace to our country from the time our Government was founded.

In the early history of our Nation there occurred what is known as the "Whisky Rebellion." The cause of this uprising was the levying of a tax by the Government upon the distilling of intoxicating liquor. The distillers refused to pay this tax, and when Government officials undertook to collect same they were assaulted in a malicious manner, while some were murdered. President Washington dealt with this criminal uprising very promptly by sending 15,000 soldiers into the rebellious district, whereby the outlawry was promptly abated, and several hundred soldiers remained in the district for some time to prevent the return of law violation. Many of the perpetrators of these crimes were arrested and convicted of treason, while others fled from the country. History tells us this was the first rebellion against the authority of our Government, and the promptness with which President Washington dealt with this unlawful uprising caused great respect for the laws of the land, and there was rest from the unlawfulness of the liquor traffic for a time.

History records another dastardly crime against governmental authority, which occurred during President Grant's administration, known as the "Whisky Ring." Some high officials of the United States Government were connected with this outlawry, and before their crimes were detected had defrauded the Government out of about $2,000,000.

In the mountainous regions of several of the States the liquor interests for more than 50 years conducted illicit stills, and thereby defrauded the Government out of many millions of dollars of revenue. All I have stated is a mere beginning of the crime and ruin brought about by the liquor traffic. It has destroyed more people than all the wars of the world, dotted our Nation with drunkards' graves from the Great Lakes on the north to the Gulf of Mexico on the south and from the Atlantic on the east to the Pacific on the west.

It has destroyed millions of homes, cheated children out of food and clothing and deprived them of an education. Its saloons were headquarters for all classes of criminals. There has never been a day when the liquor traffic showed any respect for law, and not one good act can be placed to its credit; its entire career has been a menace and a crime against mankind.

Henry W. Grady, one of the greatest newspaper editors, orators, and statesmen the world has ever known, speaking to the people of his own city, Atlanta, Ga., concerning the liquor traffic, said:

My friends, hesitate before you vote liquor back now that it is shut out. Do not trust it. It is powerful, aggressive, and universal in its attacks. Tonight it enters an humble home to strike the roses from a woman's cheek. Tomorrow it challenges this Republic in the Halls of Congress. Today it strikes a crust from the lips of a starving child. Tomorrow it levies tribute from the Government itself. There is no cottage humble enough to escape it, no place strong enough to shut it out. It is flexible to cajole but merciless in victory. It is the mortal enemy of peace and order. It is the despoiler of men, the terror of women. It is the cloud that shadows the faces of children. It is the demon that has dug more graves and sent more souls unsaved to judgment than all the pestilences that have wasted life since God sent the plagues to Egypt, and all the wars that have been fought since Joshua stood beyond Jericho.

Oh, my countrymen, loving God and humanity, do not bring this grand old city again under the dominion of that power! It can profit no man by its return. It can uplift no industry, revive no interest, remedy no wrong. You know that it cannot. It comes to destroy, and it shall profit mainly by the ruin of your sons and daughters, or mine. It comes to mislead human souls and to crush human hearts under its rumbling wheels. It comes to convert the wife's love into despair and her pride into shame. It comes to still the laughter on the lips of little children. It comes to stifle all the music of the home and fill it with silence and desolation. It comes to ruin your body and mind. It comes to wreck your home. And it knows that it must measure its prosperity by the swiftness and certainty with which it wrecks.

NOW WILL YOU VOTE IT BACK?

The liquorites revile ministers of the gospel. I believe the minister is as much entitled to the privileges of citizenship as the brewer or any other manufacturer or dealer in liquors. The minister respects and obeys the laws of our country, and his influence is for good. He is against crime and any institution which produces crime. This naturally aligns the minister against the liquor traffic.

No greater indictment can be made against the liquor traffic than is found in the following by that great orator and agnostic, Robert G. Ingersoll, who did not believe in the Christian religion. Read what he said 30 years before prohibition was adopted:

I am aware that there is prejudice against any man engaged in the manufacture of alcohol. I believe that from the time it issues from the coiled and poisonous worm in the distillery until it empties into the hell of death, dishonor, and crime it demoralizes everybody that touches it, from its source to where it ends. I do not think anybody can contemplate the subject without becoming prejudiced against the liquor crime.

All we have to do, gentlemen, is to think of the wrecks on either bank of the stream of death—the suicides, the insanity, the poverty, the ignorance, the destitution, the little children tugging at the faded and weary breasts, weeping and despairing wives asking for bread, talented men of genius it has wrecked, the struggling men with imaginary serpents produced by the devilish thing. And when you think of the jails, the almshouses, the asylums, the prisons, the scaffolds, I do not wonder that every thoughtful man is prejudiced against this stuff called alcohol.

Intemperance cuts down youth in its vigor, manhood in its strength, and age in its weakness. It breaks the father's heart, bereaves the doting mother, extinguishes the natural affections, erases conjugal love, blots out filial attachments, blights parental hope, and brings down mourning age in sorrow to the grave. It produces weakness, not strength; sickness, not health; death, not life. It makes wives, widows; children, orphans; fathers, fiends; and all of them paupers and beggars. It feeds rheumatism, it nurses gout, welcomes epidemics, invites cholera, imports pestilence, embraces consumption. It covers the land with idleness, with misery, and with crime. It fills your jails, supplies your almshouses, floods your asylums. It engenders controversies, fosters quarrels, cherishes riots. It crowds your penitentiaries, furnishes victims for your scaffolds. It is the lifeblood of the gambler, the inspiring element of the burglar, the prop of the highwayman, the support of the midnight incendiary. It countenances the liar, respects the thief, cheers the blasphemer. It violates obligations, reverences fraud, honors infamy. It defames benevolence, hates love, scorns virtue, slanders innocence. It incites the father to butcher his helpless offspring, helps the husband to massacre his wife, and the child to grind the patrician ax. It burns up men, consumes women, detests life, curses God, despises heaven. It suborns witnesses, nurses perjury, defiles ermine. It degrades the citizen, debauches the legislator, dishonors statesmen, disarms the patriot. It brings shame, not honor; brings terror, not safety; brings despair, not hope; brings misery, not happiness.

And with the malevolence of a fiend it calmly surveys its frightful desolation. Not satisfied with its havoc, it poisons felicity, kills peace, ruins morals, blights confidence, slays reputation, wipes out national honor. It then curses the world and laughs at its ruin. It does that and more—it murders the soul.

The liquor business is the sum of all villainies, father of all crimes, mother of abominations, the devil's best friend, and God's worst enemy.

We cannot afford to permit it to come back. One of the greatest crimes known to all history would be for this Government of ours to again legalize the liquor traffic. The liquor interests claim more liquor is used now than before the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. It is scarcely worth the time to undertake to refute this statement, for those who knew conditions prior to the adoption of national prohibition know there is no truth in such statement, for there is not one hundredth part of the liquor consumed now as in the days when the liquor traffic was in full sway.

It is also well known there has been a powerful effort to make national prohibition a failure, and millions of dollars have been spent in printing and distributing untruths and all kinds of malicious propaganda in regard to the supposed failure of prohibition. National prohibition was adopted after the warfare against the liquor traffic had been carried on for about 100 years. During this time an educational campaign was in continual progress bringing to the people the truths concerning the awfulness of the liquor traffic, and on account of these truths national prohibition was adopted.

After this warfare had ended and national prohibition was made a part of the Constitution and laws of our Nation the victors in this great battle felt the war was over, and certainly the public officials of the Nation whose duty it was to uphold the Constitution and demand obedience to all laws would faithfully perform such plain duties, and peace would reign supremely, and the homes, the manhood, womanhood, and childhood of the Nation would be safe from the onslaughts of the liquor traffic.

Soon after national prohibition was adopted an administration came into power at Washington to administer our Government's affairs. The outstanding individuals of this administration were the greatest criminals the world has ever known. They were opposed to national prohibition, naturally so, and said to the bootlegger: "The country is open to you. Depredate to the fullest extent." The bootlegger developed into a bank robber, highjacker, racketeer, kidnaper, housebreaker, and all class of criminals, because our National Government was being administered by the greatest criminals of all the world. Then the "wet" newspapers, "wet" organizations began to flood the country with malicious and false propaganda as to the failure of national prohibition. All this, backed by the national administration, which was aiding in all ways possible to cause prohibition to fail, makes one wonder at the great achievements, which I have already stated, of national prohibition. In this connection I can further state, since the adoption of national prohibition, hundreds of thousands of children are attending school who could not attend before, because the liquor traffic took the money that should have been used in buying food and clothing for these children. Our universities and colleges are crowded with young men and young women since the adoption of prohibition. These facts alone should cause every voter in this Nation to vote against the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

Owing to the unscrupulous manipulation of the finances of the Nation by a few dishonest financiers, which has caused the awful depression now prevailing, the liquor interests are loudly shouting that prohibition is the cause, and claiming the repeal of the eighteenth amendment will lower taxes and cause prosperity to return. This is positively disproved, as I have already shown from the records. Prior to this depression, which the malicious financial manipulators brought on, the revenues of the Government, under national prohibition increased 400 percent. As I have already stated Congress has provided for bringing back prosperity without issuing interest-bearing bonds to burden the people with hundreds of millions of dollars annually for interest payments on the bonds and without increasing taxes. So there is no reason why national prohibition should be repealed to remedy the tax burden except to relieve the multimillionaires from income taxes and place that burden on the consumers of liquor, which burden would fall upon suffering women and children of the Nation. A thousand times better would it be to allow national prohibition to continue, and have the millionaires continue paying the taxes instead of placing the burden on poor women and children, which would deprive them of food and clothing, and cheat the children out of an education. The liquor interests are raising a great howl about reduction of taxes. Let us not be deceived. The repeal of national prohibition will not bring relief, but the correction of the money system which Congress has provided for will bring permanent relief and make it impossible for such depressions as now exist ever to return.

There are three institutions which were established by the Supreme Ruler of this universe. These are the home, the school, and the church, and these must exist and prosper in order for civilization and governments to exist. The liquor traffic stands against all these when it fosters the saloon, gambling den, and house of prostitution; therefore, no government can afford to license such an institution as the liquor traffic in order to raise revenue. This would cause our Government to be guilty of all crimes which will certainly be fostered by the liquor traffic.

There is a liquor rebellion on today of much larger proportions than the one which occurred during President Washington's administration, but we have much greater facilities for suppressing the rebellion than did President Washington, and the liquor rebellion can be exterminated today just as surely as it was during the administration of President Washington. I am unwilling to admit the criminal element of our Nation possesses more power than the United States Government. If it does we have no government, but anarchy exists. I will not admit this, and all that is necessary to bring order out of chaos is to act with the promptness and determination which characterized President Washington's methods in dealing with the outlaws of the liquor traffic, and our Constitution and laws will again reign supreme.

No one will deny the right of any upright, law-abiding citizen to advocate the repeal of any section of the Constitution or any laws of the United States. But there is a correct rule of law and justice as old as time itself which prohibits individuals, organizations, magazines, newspapers, or any other faction from maliciously creating a situation and then undertaking to profit thereby.

It is well known there has been a tremendous effort, backed mainly by the brewers and other liquor interests, to cause national prohibition to fail. There have been millions of dollars spent in this effort by the same element now seeking to repeal national prohibition, and under all rules of justice and right they are prohibited from asking for this repeal. They are a shrewd bunch and liable, by their hypocritical claims, to deceive many who fail to ascertain the truth for themselves. They are bringing on the repeal elections first in States which are overwhelmingly wet and have always been. Then they publish in flaming headlines in the newspapers throughout the Nation a certain State has repudiated the eighteenth amendment, when, in fact, such State had never favored same. But this is characteristic of the liquor-traffic advocates. They have never been sincere, fair, and out in the open with the truth.

I am not a preacher; I wish I were; neither am I the son of a preacher; but I will say the teachings of the Man of Galilee, the Savior of men, if strictly adhered to would settle every issue before the people and settle it right. Then we would really have a government of the people and for the people. This does not mean the union of church and state; everybody is opposed to that; but I do mean that righteousness should prevail; "that we should bring our politics up to patriotism, our citizenship up to Christianity, and our ballot up to the Bible" and vote against repeal of the eighteenth amendment, thereby prohibiting our Government's granting license to the liquor traffic, which traffic has nothing but crime, shame, degradation, and ruin to its credit.

Mr. HOEPEL. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield? I should like to ask several questions of general interest.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I will not have time. I cannot yield for general questions.

Mr. HOEPEL. Well, I want to ask this question: Is there anything disclosed in the hearings to indicate what would be the minimum wage scale for labor?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not know that anything was disclosed as to what would be considered as a minimum wage, but it is provided for a minimum wage and maximum hours. I presume that would be left to the administrator, and that the President will appoint a competent administrator and that he will take care of that situation.

Mr. HOEPEL. Was there anything disclosed in the hearings as to whether or not if a man refused to work at the minimum wage he would be imprisoned, as they were in 1920 when the railroads were under Government operation?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Oh, I do not yield for such a question.

Mr. HOEPEL. I should like the gentleman to answer that question.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Oh, it would take a month to answer all of such questions. Has the gentleman read the bill and read the report?

Mr. HOEPEL. I have read the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman can come to his own conclusion about it, from what is in the report and in the bill. There would be a thousand of other things the gentleman would like to know and 10,000 others he would need to know. I do not yield further, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Am I correct in understanding that a change has been made in the tax on the moving-picture industry?

Mr. DOUGHTON. There is nothing carried in this bill as to the tax on moving pictures, unless it is carrying forward the tax for 1 more year. All of these excise taxes are extended for 1 year.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Respecting the inquiry I made a few minutes ago regarding postage, I am advised by Mr. PARKER, of the Joint Committee on Taxation, that there is nothing in this bill extending the tax on stamps. Therefore, it is entirely satisfactory, and there should be no reference to it in the bill.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. As I understand it, this is the President's bill. Can the gentleman tell us whether the President is responsible for the provision in respect to taxes?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I understand the President has put the responsibility on the Congress of raising the revenue needed under this bill. He has left to the Congress of the United States its constitutional right to say how this money shall be raised and what taxes shall be imposed.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I understand, then, that the revenue provisions of the bill are offered on the responsibility of the committee only.

Mr. DOUGHTON. As far as I know, that is true.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. KENNEY. My first concern is to put our people back to work. Does the gentleman know—or have any idea—just how soon we can get these public works under way after this bill is passed?

Mr. DOUGHTON. They will be started just as soon as the organization can be set up. In my opinion, no time will be lost. This is an emergency measure to take care of an immediate need. Work will get under way just as rapidly as it is humanly possible to start it.

Mr. KENNEY. The starting of the work will not wait upon the raising of revenue through these new taxes?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Not at all.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. With regard to the public-works program, regarding the building of Federal buildings, which was eliminated under the Reforestation Act, can the gentleman tell us whether or not this program will be restored?

Mr. DOUGHTON. That work was only suspended, but that is provided for in this bill. It is authorized. The funds administered for that purpose will be under the direction of the President and those who administer the law. It comes under the provision of this bill, but I cannot state just how much money will be expended under it for public buildings.

Mr. McFARLANE. One further question. Is there anything in the bill with regard to whether the bonds that are to be issued are to be redeemable in gold?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Has the gentleman read the bill?

Mr. McFARLANE. I have read the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I can say nothing further than what is carried in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair advises the gentleman from North Carolina that he has consumed 1 hour.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Is it the chairman's idea that the money made available for road construction, $400,000,000 under this bill, is in lieu of the money which already has been appropriated for construction of this nature?

Mr. DOUGHTON. As I understand it, it is an additional appropriation.

Mr. MOTT. It is an additional appropriation?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Absolutely.

Mr. MOTT. I am very glad to have this information, and I hope it is correct.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, may I call attention to the fact that in the former appropriation there was a matching process between the State and the Federal Government which does not occur in the matter of this $400,000,000.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is not required in the present bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. So that any grants to which the gentleman refers, previously made, are on the old basis, whereas this new grant is a complete donation from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. DOUGHTON. As I understand, that is right. The authorization by the last Congress did not require the Federal appropriation be matched by the State.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I should like to invite attention to this language appearing in subsection (c) of section 202, page 12, which provides as follows:

Projects of the character heretofore constructed or carried on either directly by public authority or with public aid to serve the interests of the general public.

This should include everything.

Mr. KRAMER. On page 13, line 4, referring to the words "and amendments", does that refer to the amendments that have been made by the two bills that were passed yesterday or to subsequent amendments which will be created after this bill has been passed and signed by the President? In other words, the word "amendments" in this bill does not specifically describe what amendments are referred to.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Of course, Mr. Chairman, that means any amendments that are made up to the time the law becomes effective.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Watson].

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I voted to favorably report this bill out of the committee, but I made the reservation that I would not, and could not, vote the measure into law.

My main objection is the great increase of our national debt and also the increased revenue that must be paid as interest. Since the period of the war we reduced our national debt by nearly $10,000,000,000, bringing it close to $17,000,000,000. Our national debt is now nearly $22,000,000,000, and we are in that period of our financial history, during this depression, that taxes are becoming a great burden upon the American people, and not only a burden but a serious one because we are approaching that hour when we will have nearly reached our incapacity to pay. When we arrive at that period then we are pretty close to a capital tax, and a capital tax means the breaking down of our financial structure.

I believe there is more ill brought out in this bill than good. If we analyze the many constructive bills that have been enacted since the Seventy-third Congress convened, there has not been very great prosperity as the result; a little here and there to renew clothing and commodities; industries have started to meet these demands.

We cannot force prosperity by legislation. We have tried that, and it has been a failure. We can only bring prosperity by demand, and when there is demand there is prosperity. Look to England, if you please. They have had a dole since the war. Has prosperity commenced there? Has prosperity created any great wealth in Germany, and I dare not mention Russia, because Russia is not a nation that we can compare with the civilized nations of the world.

I remember reading a statement by a historian that a ruler given autocratic power soon becomes a despot and a poor sovereign when he would probably have been a very good ruler if he listened to the legislative power. I do not allude to Mr. Roosevelt, because I am in sympathy with his endeavor. If he can bring prosperity, I will give him all the credit that is due him, but prosperity I fear is not in this bill. Dictators seem to be the political fashion of the hour.

Following this bill we will have to increase our normal taxes, levy a tax on dividends, and also impose a gasoline tax. In time of peace, peace with ourselves and with all the world, we are imposing war taxes for the American people to pay. Is this good philosophy? Not as I understand economic methods.

I am in favor of a manufacturers' sales tax in preference to the taxes that are now in the bill.

Two years ago a sales tax was reported from the committee with a Democratic majority, but the bill failed of passage in the House.

They have a manufacturers' sales tax in Australia, in Germany, in France, and in Canada. The expert who came before our committee, who was also the expert in writing a sales tax bill for Australia and Canada, said our bill was the most perfect of all manufacturers' sales tax written by any country. If you will recall, in Canada the manufacturers' sales tax at first was only 1 cent, but now it is 4. The farmers naturally were against the Canadian bill, but when they realized what they gained by it, they now favor it, although it is 4 cents.

I am rather surprised that this Congress has not the power or the ability to legislate. They have extended their power to the President. Ignoring the Constitution, a constitution upon which was builded the greatest Nation of all the world. Today our Nation is a world power, not by the dictatorship of the present, not by our weakness to legislate, but by the action of the past.

Rienzi, when he was speaking to the Senators in Rome, in its period of decay, said:

Where are those Romans, their power, their virtue, their prestige?

We may ask the same question as to our forbears.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. According to recent history, a Mr. Grundy wrote a tariff bill for Congress. Did the gentleman vote for it?

Mr. WATSON. I want the gentleman to know that I voted for all tariff bills. I expect to vote for all tariff bills in the future, because I believe it is the only legislation that has brought prosperity to this country, and I know the gentleman thinks so, too.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman says that the Grundy tariff bill brought prosperity to the country?

Mr. WATSON. There was no Grundy tariff bill.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman better read his history.

Mr. WATSON. I know Mr. Grundy. He lives only a few miles from me. I know him better than the gentleman does. The gentleman has not even a speaking acquaintance with him. [Laughter.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I have supported to the best of my ability the economy bill which the President sent here. I have supported every other measure which he has recommended for recovery, but now we have before us an extravagant program of the President, and that I shall not follow.

This bill proposes to spend $3,300,000,000 on public works which we do not need and cannot afford. They tell us it will put 6,000,000 men to work. Statistics show that it cannot put much more than one man to work for each $3,000 spent. If you allow a little liberality in figures, you cannot get over 1,500,000 at the most, and you are going to spread that out over a period of a year and a half, and that makes approximately a million men.

Why should we go ahead with such a program? What will it do besides waste money? It means throwing on the market, in addition to these things that already are provided for, of about $600,000,000 of bonds every 3 months. That is in addition to what we have previously provided for by the home loan bill and the farm loan bill, and so every 3 months you will depress the market with $750,000,000 in all of bonds of the United States.

That will depress the prices of securities, the price of labor, and the price of commodities. It is a reactionary measure which we ought not to indulge in at such a time as this.

The peculiarity of this is that other things are tied to this legislation.

It is an industry-control proposition. This bill will destroy industry. It has nothing in store for us except the increase of importations of foreign commodities.

Here is the situation. This bill will make a powerful appeal to Herr Hitler and Comrade Stalin; but after the American people have had a dose of it, it will arouse in them the spirit of freedom which has been stilled for some time, and again you will see a devotion to liberty that will lead us back to sound judgment and to prosperity later on. But this is a reactionary measure designed to prevent the return of prosperity, and to delay economic recovery. Let us turn down that kind of stuff and give America a chance to get back. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I was very glad to have the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means inform the House a few moments ago that the revenue-raising feature of the bill did not come from the administration at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. That is the reason the rule providing for this legislation was almost defeated, as it should have been. With a majority of more than 200 on the other side of the House, there was practically a tie vote for and against that rule. That was an evidence that you gentlemen on the Democratic side of the aisle understood the bill, understood the seriousness of the resolution, and that you were voting your own convictions, and I congratulate you for it. The rule was a bad one, and it should have been defeated.

I called to the attention of the House this morning the fact that taxes on incomes in the low brackets, such as usually apply to doctors, dentists, moderate-priced lawyers, and professional men in and out of the smaller cities, are increased in this legislation 50 percent, while the taxes of a gentleman, such as now being examined on the other end of the Capitol who is worth probably $250,000,000 or $300,000,000, is increased 2 percent in this bill, although in the last 3 or 4 years he has not paid any income tax. He says he did pay some to England, but not to the United States.

Mr. GILCHRIST. He has given it to his friends.

Mr. BRITTEN. He has distributed some of it to his friends, it is true. The increase in dividend taxes, intended to raise $83,000,000 additional taxes is in like proportion to the income tax increases in the bill, and let me suggest to you that the sole source of income of the average doctor, dentist, lawyer, teacher, professional man or woman generally is dividends and bonds, but quite generally, dividends. Let us see what this bill does to their dividends in the lower brackets of $3,000, $4,000, $5,000, and $6,000, where there are today no tax assessments. Those taxes are increased from nothing to $210. In the $7,000, which is not a high bracket as incomes go, the tax in this bill is increased 3,000 percent. That is something to take home to your constituents and mine. In the $10,000 bracket the tax in this bill is increased 1,500 percent; in the $14,000 bracket it is increased 700 percent, and so on down to finally when you get to the millionaire bracket, the bracket of easy evasion, evidently, it is only 15 percent. My idea is that this list should be turned upside down, and that 3,000 percent increase should be tacked onto the million-dollar bracket.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. That would yield a good deal more income, would it not?

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, yes; much more.

Mr. McFARLANE. I should like the gentleman to tell us at this time what provision he would offer as a tax substitute?

Mr. BRITTEN. Unfortunately I am not on the committee; but if I had my way I would take all the increases in the income taxes, gasoline, and otherwise, dividends, and so forth, that are provided in this bill and wipe them out and substitute for them a manufacturers' sale tax leaving out clothing and foodstuffs.

Mr. McFARLANE. At what rate?

Mr. BRITTEN. At 1.8 per cent.

Mr. McFARLANE. How much would that raise?

Mr. BRITTEN. Two hundred and fifty million dollars, or plenty to accommodate the $220,000,000 or $230,000,000 that is necessary for the payment of interest and refunding.

One of the worst features of the bill is the three quarters percent additional tax on gasoline which is estimated to raise $92,000,000 per annum. Gasoline taxes in many localities have risen to the point where they are bringing into play the law of diminishing returns, and anything added to them at this time will increase the area over which that law comes into play. Many States are collecting practically 38 percent of their revenues from taxes on motor vehicles at the present moment, and I can see no justification for an increase in this Federal tax on gasoline. In fact, the tax is inequitable and is a discriminating burden on the most over-taxed class of citizens in the country today. I believe the Federal Government is now collecting some $200,000,000 a year from the automotive industry and its customers. I cannot for the life of me understand why the framers of this bill did not accept a manufacturers' sales tax, excluding clothing and foodstuffs, and by so doing, avoid any increases in income-tax brackets from now on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Beck] and make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-five Members present, a quorum. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues of the House, I say without affectation that I never rose to address the House with a greater sense of responsibility than at this moment. It is not that I flatter myself for one moment that anything that I can say, or possibly anything that anyone else can say, will influence a single vote, and that remark is in no respect an imputation upon the sincerity, the candor, or the patriotism of any Member of the House; but arguments rarely change votes, as we all know. However, it does seem to me important to make a record, if it is possible, of what is a very critical hour in the history of the Republic, so that future generations, if they turn back to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, may know that there were some Members of the House, who at least protested against a transformation of that form of government, under which we had grown surpassingly rich and powerful, into a new form of government, which those who framed the Constitution, if they could "revisit the glimpses of the moon", would today be unable to recognize.

As the shadows of evening are lengthening with us now, the shadows of a lasting night are falling upon the old constitutional edifice, which the genius of Washington, Franklin, Madison, Hamilton, and Jefferson built with such surpassing wisdom. While Jefferson was not a member of the Constitutional Convention, his ideal of liberty was one of its inspirations, and it might be well to recall, as we consider the nature of this bill, those noble words of his first inaugural, which I may commend to the nominal disciples of Jefferson here assembled, when he said that his ideal of a true republic was a "wise and frugal government, which would restrain men from injuring each other, but otherwise leave them free to pursue their own pursuits of liberty and industry, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned." [Applause.] I quote from memory, but with substantial accuracy. Those words of Jefferson could be written in gold over the portals of the Capitol, but they are now "more honored in the breach than the observance". From that high ideal this country has long since departed, and we are now about to transform a representative democracy into a virtual dictatorship in the vital matter of industry. The fact is not open to debate, because it was frankly recognized by the distinguished dean of this House, when he opened the argument upon the rule, that the bill under consideration does create a dictatorship.

It cannot be said, if we are passing from an old order to a new order, that such a fate was not within the anticipation of the fathers. Washington, in his Farewell Address, said pointedly that when one department of government usurped the functions of another, and constitutional limitations were no longer respected, representative government would cease and the Constitution would be "undermined". Such was his expression, and I quote his words:

After warning all succeeding generations of Americans—

That the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres; avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another—

And after further warning that such spirit of encroachment—tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism—

Washington added:

If in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation, for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed.

How prophetic seem his words today, for we are now substituting a "despotism" for a free nation. Franklin in the last days of the convention, when with tears in his eyes he besought the members to sign the great compact, said in substance that this Government would last as long as there was any virtue in the body of the people, but when that was wanting the Republic would become a despotism.

In the vital matter of industry we are about to yield to a virtual despotism in this country.

So that all that is now happening is what the fathers expected to happen, if the people of this Nation were unworthy of the priceless heritage given to them in the Constitution of the United States.

We are going to have a new Constitution, not formally framed or ratified, but by executive usurpation. If you read in the New York Times a few days ago interviews of the members of the Cabinet and supermembers of the Cabinet, who although they nominally occupy lesser positions than heads of departments, are more powerful than the Cabinet, you will see as frank an acknowledgment as the distinguished member of the Committee on Rules made this morning, that the old order had passed, and that an entirely new order was about to begin. If so, we ought to frankly recognize the reality and consider a new Constitution, in order that we shall not live under the hypocritical pretense of having one kind of government in practice and another in theory.

While I do not see the prospect of any master architects that will be able today to rebuild upon the old foundations of the Constitution a new Constitution with the same wisdom as the master builders of 1787, yet the "brain trust" is ceaselessly at work "undermining" our Constitution, to use Washington's phrase. They work silently but none the less effectually. In this construction of a new form of government—now in progress—Professor Moley takes the place of George Washington, and Professor Tugwell that of Hamilton, and Professor Berle that of James Wilson, and the old architects must yield to these new architects, who, fresh from the academic cloisters of Columbia University, and with the added inspiration of all they have learned in Moscow, are now intent upon rebuilding upon the ruins of the old Constitution a new Constitution, in which, as in the old German Reichstag, this Congress will be merely a debating society, and the Executive will be master of the destinies of the American people.

By what possible ingenuity of reasoning can there be any justification for this legislation?

I pass by the $3,300,000,000 appropriation. I recognize it may temporarily give some employment. My prediction is that it will ultimately, by destroying the credit of the United States, displace more labor than it creates. I will say more. If there be a representative of either the employer class or of the laboring class in the galleries, I say to them both by way of prediction, and I hope I am not a Cassandra, uttering prophecies which, though true, are nevertheless disbelieved at the time, that as large as is the appropriation of $3,300,000,000, they are selling the constitutional liberties of the American people for a petty price, for this sum is the "thirty pieces of silver", with which the ancient liberties of the American people, as defended by Jefferson in the inaugural address already quoted, are now being betrayed.

The Constitution today exists in form, but it has largely ceased to exist in spirit. Its disintegration has been proceeding for many years, and notably in the last quarter of a century, and both political parties must accept some share of the responsibility.

A great Chief Justice of the United States nearly a generation ago, in delivering a powerful dissenting opinion in the famous Lottery case, said: "It is with governments as with religions, the form often survives the substance of the faith." His analogy to extinct religions is a very striking one. Time and again, after the soul of a religion has perished, its temples remained and its priests continued their ceremonial rites, even though, like the augurs of ancient Rome, they winked at each other while standing at the altar.

This is true today of the Constitution of the United States. Time was when Members of Congress, in considering the extent of its powers, at least paid the Constitution lip service, but that time is passed and any challenge in the Congress to its power to pass a given measure, for which no discernible grant of power in the Constitution can be found, is greeted with cynical indifference. It is true that the mechanical form of our Government still remains. We still have a President, a Congress, and a Supreme Court; but the man is blind who cannot see that the office of President is no longer the office which the Constitution created, and that the powers of Congress, as the great Council of the Republic, have gone into an eclipse. It does little more than register the will of the Executive. In a sense, the President is not an usurping dictator, for the unprecedented powers which he has now gained were given to him by a too subservient Congress and could be taken from him by Congress; but it is true that the President will exercise over production, transportation, banking, and other instrumentalities of commerce greater powers than those enjoyed by all his predecessors, either in times of war or peace. In that sense he will be the economic dictator of America.

Now a dictator, whether his power rests upon force or the voluntary acquiescence of the people, has a supremely difficult task. Even in a country that is homogeneous and whose economic interests are in harmony, such a dictator treads a dangerous path. To be a successful dictator in a country, whose population is heterogeneous and whose economic interests are in conflict, is an almost impossible task.

The difficulty with a dictatorship is that in assuming all power, he accepts all responsibility. Greek mythology tells us of Phaeton, who attempted to drive the chariot of the sun, and he came to grief. Let us hope that our too daring charioteer, as he attempts to drive the chariot of America's economic destinies, may not have a like fate.

Some, who still revere the Constitution, may solace themselves with the belief that the present crisis only marks a moratorium on the Constitution, but the Constitution does not recognize the possibility of a moratorium. Moreover, revolutions rarely go backward. Constitutions are made for times of stress even more than for times of peace and prosperity.

While the present revolution in our political form of government is pacific and may represent temporarily the general will, yet it no longer remains what it was, any more than the form of government in Italy was the same after parliamentary government was abolished and all power was vested in a dictator. If such powers succeed, or seem to succeed in ending the depression, the American people will not, I fear, be greatly concerned about the change in our form of government, for at present they feel that any port is good enough in a storm. The present generation of Americans are hopeless pragmatists.

The change has some justification in greater efficiency of administration, but the Constitution refused to sacrifice security for efficiency. The justification of our old form of government was that there was greater security in the composite judgment of the Congress than there could be in the judgment of an individual, who, for a time, was President of the United States. A caesar may be far more efficient than a senate, but the Roman Republic came to an end when the policies of Rome were determined by Caesar and not by the senate. In this connection, it may be well to recall the noble definition of a free government, which Mr. Justice Matthews, speaking for the Supreme Court, gave in the case of Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356:

"When we consider the nature and the theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not mean to leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power. Sovereignty itself is, of course, not subject to law, for it is the author and source of law; but in our system, while sovereign powers are delegated to the agencies of government, sovereignty itself remains with the people, by whom and for whom all government exists and acts. And the law is the definition and limitation of power. It is, indeed, quite true, that there must always be lodged somewhere, and in some personal body, the authority of final decision; and, in many cases of mere administration the responsibility is purely political, no appeal lying except to the ultimate tribunal of the public judgment, exercised either in the pressure of opinion or by means of the suffrage. But the fundamental rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, considered as individual possession, are secured by those maxims of constitutional law which are the monuments showing the victorious progress of the race in securing to men the blessings of civilization under the reign of just and equal laws, so that, in the famous language of the Massachusetts Bill of Rights, the government of the Commonwealth 'may be a government of laws and not of men'. For, the very idea that one man may be compelled to hold his life, or the means of living, or any material right essential to the enjoyment of life, at the mere will of another, seems to be intolerable in any country where freedom prevails, as being the essence of slavery itself."

Some future Gibbon may entertain the view when he comes to narrate the decline and fall of the American Constitution. He may express the opinion that the Constitution remained as it began, one of the wisest and noblest charters of government in the annals of mankind, and that it failed in the hysteria of an economic crisis, not because it was unsound in theory, but because the present generations of Americans were unworthy of their priceless heritage. Will posterity pronounce this verdict upon us for selling our birthright for a mess of pottage?

Such a historian should recognize that the cataclysm that followed the World War destroyed in nearly every nation parliamentary forms of government, which, one by one, were succeeded by dictators, and he may sardonically observe that, while our Nation, with its Constitution still in full vigor, had entered the World War to save the world for democracy, the only perceptible result of the victory has been the destruction of democracy in America, which can only function through parliamentary institutions.

However, we are not now concerned with the views of the historian of the future. The first duty of the thoughtful man is to determine the reality of the present situation.

Possibly no people are so deluded by phrases as the American people. They confuse theories with realities. They are either apathetic to the destruction of their constitutional form of government, or they do not realize its steady subversion. To them it is enough that the great charter, in its original characters—now hardly legible—stands upon the walls of the Congressional Library in Washington, and the average American cheats himself with the delusion that its mighty mandates still have self-executing power.

It is not merely that many great limitations of the Constitution are openly disregarded, or that powers are now exercised, which were never granted to the Federal Government, or that the respective functions of the executive and legislative branches of the Government have been hopelessly confused, but, even more important, many of the basic purposes of the Constitution, of which its written provisions were but one expression, have now been destroyed.

Let me illustrate my meaning by only one instance. The Constitution was called into existence to insure the freedom of commerce between the States. Before it was adopted every State burdened the free flow of commerce with conflicting and hostile regulations. To emancipate commerce, the power to put it into shackles was taken from the States by the simple grant that Congress should have power to "regulate" such commerce. It was never intended that Congress should then proceed to put upon commerce the very shackles that it had been created to destroy, and this is shown by the fact that in the first century of our existence under the Constitution, Congress never exercised any power to regulate interstate commerce, unless we except the subsidies of land to the transcontinental railroads.

In the absence of any Federal regulation it was held by the Supreme Court that the failure of Congress to exercise its power of regulation was its mandate that commerce should be free, and for a full century this policy of freedom remained, and under it a great continent was conquered, the Atlantic and Pacific linked by steel rails, and the Republic became one of the greatest nations in the world.

Exactly one century after the Constitution was adopted Congress abandoned that policy and began to forge the chains for commerce by bureaucratic regulation. That year it created the Interstate Commerce Commission, and this was followed in 1890 by the Sherman antitrust law, which vainly attempted to limit the inevitable tendency of business to combine into larger units. Ever since there has been an ever-increasing regulation of American business by Federal bureaus, and now we are building a more stupendous and tyrannical bureaucracy than ever before.

In the first century of the Republic it was generally recognized that Federal powers could only be exercised to accomplish Federal purposes, but the destruction of the Constitution began when Congress entered upon the destructive policy of utilizing Federal powers to usurp the powers reserved to the States. For example, it was soon seen that if Congress could appropriate moneys for non-Federal purposes without challenge, it could supervise the use of such moneys and thus usurp fields of power which were the exclusive province of the States.

About a generation ago it was first asserted that Congress could deny the privilege of engaging in interstate commerce to anyone who did not conform to the views of Congress as to the methods of production. This heresy has now been carried to the extreme of holding that no one can engage in interstate commerce as of right, and that the Government may license or refuse to license a citizen to engage in interstate commerce. Such was not the doctrine of the Supreme Court in the time of the great Chief Justice, for Marshall, in Gibbons v. Ogden, said:

"In pursuing this inquiry at the bar, it has been said that the Constitution does not confer the right of intercourse between State and State. That right derives its source from these laws, whose authority is acknowledged by civilized man throughout the world. This is true. The Constitution found it an existing right, and gave to Congress the power to regulate it."

Indeed, the right to follow a lawful calling, and for this purpose to engage in interstate commerce is one of the natural rights which are included in the solemn guaranty of the right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness", but the theory of this bill is that unless the manufacturer conforms to the wishes of the Federal Government in regard to the hours of labor, his maximum output, and minimum wages, and other restrictions, he can be proscribed by his own Government, and denied the privilege of selling his products in interstate trade.

This is economic slavery. It destroys not merely the rights of the States but the basic freedom of the individual to engage in lawful occupations. It concerns both employer and employee, and, again to quote Jefferson's words in his first inaugural, it "takes from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned."

The two basic industries of America are concerned with the production of agricultural products and the manufacture of goods. The Constitution did not attempt to give any power over the production of either class of commodities. If they required regulation, such power belonged to the States; and, as stated, the Federal Government acted upon this theory for more than a century. The Government could tax products and it could "regulate" their interstate transportation or their exportation to foreign countries. Nothing would have more amazed the generation, which created the Constitution, than the idea that the Federal Government, which they were creating, could regulate the conditions of the farm or the factory. Notwithstanding this, the Federal Government for many years past has, through its many bureaus and commissions and notably through its Departments of Agriculture and Labor, attempted to control both the factory and the farm.

In this connection, let me make a passing reference to the most recent radio speech of our President. It was both adroit and ingratiating.

The address, in most respects admirable in form and substance, seemed to me to contain one disingenuous suggestion, which was the more dangerous because of the irresistible charm of the speaker.

He calmly assured his countrymen that in this emergency legislation there has been "no actual surrender" by the Congress "of power." The President said:

Congress still retains its constitutional authority, and no one has the slightest desire to change the balance of these powers.

This means that when the Constitution imposes a direct duty upon Congress, as to regulate the value of currency or to impose taxes, it exercises that power when it turns over to the President or some executive official the absolute power to exercise it. In other words, the abdication of a power is the exercise of the power.

Such a doctrine is a complete destruction of the division of powers as prescribed by the Constitution. It is the present German idea of constitutional law, for the German Parliament, in one sweeping delegation of power to the Chancellor, gave him complete power to make any laws, although the legislative power, under the Weimar Constitution, was vested in the Reichstag.

This is not a mere matter of detail. It goes to the foundations of the Constitution. That great document required that the Congress and not the President should determine whether war should be declared; that the Congress and not the President should regulate the value of our currency; that Congress and not the President should impose taxes. It was intended that these important functions should be discharged by a body which would broadly represent the people of the country. If there be any justification for such action, it lies in the fact that the present critical conditions require an abandonment of our constitutional safeguards. Such a theory is intelligible although not tenable, but the theory, as advanced by the President in his recent radio address, that the Congress retains its powers when it makes a complete delegation of them to executive officials, makes the Constitution a mere rhapsody of words.

About a generation ago I argued a case called "the Lottery case" (188 U.S. 321). It was one of the very great cases of the Supreme Court of the United States.

In a sense it is the supplement to, and may rank second in importance to the great case of Gibbons and Ogden, in which the commerce power was first defined.

In the Lottery case I represented the Government and my contention then, which the Supreme Court sustained, was that the power to regulate commerce included the power to prohibit it when essential to Federal ends. But, I said, the right to prohibit was subject to other limitations in the Constitution, and the greatest of all those limitations was obviously the Tenth Amendment, solemnly but futilely guaranteeing that the rights of the States, and what is more significant, the rights of the people of the States as individuals, should never be taken from them, unless by some express grant in the Constitution or by the necessary implication of such grants.

The Supreme Court sustained this contention, and they said in the conclusion of the opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan that while this power to regulate was the power to prohibit, yet, nevertheless, it must be taken as subject to the fundamental liberties of the American citizen and could never be arbitrary or capricious. That great Justice, who had a consuming love for the old Constitution, said:

"We may, however, repeat, in this connection, what the court has heretofore said, that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States, although plenary, cannot be deemed arbitrary, since it is subject to such limitations or restrictions as are prescribed by the Constitution. This power, therefore, may not be exercised so as to infringe rights secured or protected by that instrument."

Notwithstanding this warning there began to be evolved the doctrine that by the perversion of the commerce power the Federal Government could usurp the reserved rights of the States, that it could go into the States and say to them: "You have not properly exercised your reserved police powers to meet this economic evil, or that economic evil, and, therefore, we will now say that either by the power of taxation, the greatest of all Federal powers, or by the power over commerce, we will compel you to do so either at the risk of a prohibitive tax or at the risk of being denied the opportunity to engage in commerce."

That was the doctrine suggested, and it has been the basis of a great deal of subsequent legislation. The decision in the Lottery case, while sound in theory, was one of the most fateful and mischievous decisions in its effect upon the expansion of Federal power that the Supreme Court ever rendered, because it has been wrongfully interpreted to give to Congress this tremendously coercive and tyrannous power over commerce in order to take from the constituent States their reserved rights, which we had supposed, vainly supposed, had been guaranteed by the Tenth Amendment of the Constitution.

Now, we have the full fruitage of the doctrine of the Lottery Case in this legislation. It makes the President the economic dictator of the industrial activities of the American people, as the Congress has already made the Secretary of Agriculture the virtual dictator over the agricultural interests of the country.

But how can the power be exercised? By denying access to the channels of interstate trade; and to deny them such access is, of course, to take from most industries the opportunity to exist, because they cannot exist within the borders of a particular State in these days of mass production.

This is not a case in which you could reason that, as the validity of this legislation is doubtful, it can be left to the Supreme Court. This is always a questionable expedient, because no concrete case may ever reach the Supreme Court. But in this case there can be no question under later decisions of the Supreme Court that you cannot do what you are trying to do—to make the President the economic dictator of the United States—by putting in his hand the big stick of the commerce power, because in the case of Hammer against Dagenhart (247 U.S. 251) it was held that where an attempt was made by the commerce power to coerce the States in the matter of child labor, the Court—although by a bare majority—held that that was such a clear perversion of the commerce power as to amount to a destruction of the guaranty to the States of local self-government in the matter of production, guaranteed by the tenth amendment of the Constitution. In that case the Supreme Court expressly held:

There is no power vested in Congress to require the States to extend their police power so as to prevent possible unfair competition.

The theory of the present bill is that there is a police power in the Federal Government to prevent unfair competition in production. For this heresy there is no justification in any declaration of the Supreme Court, and even if it were otherwise tenable, the expression "unfair competition" is so vague that no manufacturer could ever know how to conduct his business, except at the risk of being sent to prison, because he had erroneously guessed what were the undefined ethics of business.

It is not important that the products of the farm may subsequently go into interstate commerce, for the Supreme Court, in the notable case of United Mine Workers v. Coronado Co., 259 U.S. 344, said:

Coal mining is not interstate commerce and obstruction of coal mining, though it may prevent coal from going into interstate commerce, is not a restraint of that commerce unless the obstruction to mining is intended to restrain commerce in it or has necessarily such a direct, material, and substantial effect to restrain it that the intent reasonably must be inferred.

Those who think that this legislation will be sustained, should not place too much dependence upon the fact that the case of Hammer against Dagenhart was decided by an almost divided Court, for in a later case, a case I too happened to argue—the case of Bailey against the Drexel Furniture Co. (259 U.S. 20)—where the United States invoked the supreme power of taxation, as absolute as the power of any sovereign nation in all the world, yet when the taxing power was thus sought to be used to make it impossible for any manufacturer to employ child labor, the Court, with only one justice dissenting, held that that also was a clear perversion of the power of taxation and that it amounted to a usurpation of the rights of the States. Thus it held that each State, if it wanted to abolish child labor, could do so, but it was not for the Federal Government to usurp this police power of the States.

I am not saying that the law you are now proposing may not in some way pass the gauntlet of the Supreme Court. I say this, because in the first place the plea will be made that it is justified by the existing emergency. But please remember that in the emergency cases nearly all were either cases of State statutes, passed under the reserved sovereign power of the States except as granted to the Federal Government; and, therefore, in passing upon the larger power of the States, except as granted to the Federal Government by the Constitution, the Supreme Court did hold that if a State felt that in a given emergency some particularly drastic legislation were required, it might be justified on such ground, of which it was the final judge. The other exceptional class of cases were those in which the Federal Government exercised its territorial powers, as, for example, its exclusive power over the District of Columbia.

There is one Federal case, and that is the Adamson law case, Wilson against New (243 U.S. 332), a case in which again there was an almost evenly divided court—but there the Supreme Court was dealing with an instrumentality of interstate commerce, and therefore the Government had in respect of the interstate railroads of the United States a peculiar power—but even in that case the Court never said that a bill to raise the wages of labor could possibly be passed lawfully by the Congress, but all it said was that for a short period, in order to allow railroad executives sufficient time to negotiate the terms of labor with their employees, that the law, as a mere stopgap, was permissible.

As a matter of fact, the Court has again and again, by declarations whose meaning to the discerning lawyer cannot admit of doubt, indicated that that case had gone to the verge of Federal power, and I think the fair implication of its language in subsequent cases is that it has gone far beyond the limit. Nevertheless, the responsibility upon us, under our oath of office, is infinitely grave, because the situation is that by the time any case would reach the Supreme Court this law would have been so long in force that the Supreme Court, not being omnipotent, could not unscramble eggs that have already been scrambled. Moreover, the Supreme Court is a court in a nation of democratic institutions, and it has neither purse nor sword, and it must often sustain unconstitutional statutes on the theory of reasonable doubt or emergency legislation, because they can no longer unscramble eggs that have already been scrambled. In this attempt one finds a great deal of ingenious and almost disingenuous reasoning, and it reminds one of the story told by Jonathan Swift in his very powerful satire, written in the early days of the eighteenth century, called "The Tale of a Tub." It is so appropriate that even at the risk of taking the little remaining time I have, I must tell it. According to Jonathan Swift, a testator had three sons, and he said to them on his deathbed:

I am leaving you my property under a will, and that will provides that under no circumstances are you ever to wear any ornament of any kind upon the coat, which I am giving each of you by my will.

He said—

The coat will last you as long as you live, and as you grow and expand, the coat will grow with you.

They took their patrimony and thereupon moved into London society and then found that shoulder knots upon coats were demanded by the dictates of fashion, and thereupon they looked to the will and there was this provision that under no circumstances should the coats ever be changed, and thereupon one ingenious son said, "Well, if we read this totidem verbis perhaps we would find the words 'shoulder knot'", but they could not, and then another son said, "If we read this totidem syllabis we can find our justification", but no syllables spelled "shoulder knots", and then they invoked the totidem literis method and found the letters for shoulder knots, except the letter "k", and the ingenious son said, "Well, the letter 'c' in Latin was pronounced 'k' and therefore, as the other letters are there, shoulder knots are in the will and we will wear shoulder knots." After they had worn shoulder knots a little while gold fringes came in, and then the ingenious son said, "Well, after all, there are two kinds of wills, a written will and a nuncupative will, and now I remember my old father did say that gold lining was just what was wanted for the coat, and therefore, under this theory of a nuncupative will, I will wear gold lining." Then silver fringes came in and, eager to wear them, one of these ingenious sons suggested that every good will had a codicil, and thereupon they forged a codicil to the will, which provided that silver fringe could be worn. They invented the theory that "fringe" meant "broomstick" and the will only prevented the wearing of broomsticks upon their coats. When, however, it was suggested that it was "silver fringes" that was forbidden, and the word "silver" had no reference to broomsticks, the sons concluded that they had exhausted their ingenuity of interpretation, and thereupon they said, "Well, let us lock the old man's will up in a box where we will never see it again and do just as we please."

This fable could be told of the whole constitutional history of this country. The Supreme Court has done great work in restraining any trespass of the States upon the Federal power, but when it comes to restraining the excesses of Federal power upon the States the Court has been less effective, for in all the history of our country there have not been 50 cases where the Supreme Court ever decided that a Federal statute was invalid, although literally thousands of unconstitutional statutes have been passed by Congress by perverting its powers to gain non-Federal ends.

By refined interpretation, by the doctrine of reasonable doubt, by the theory of emergency—one of the most dangerous of constitutional heresies—breaches have been made in the dyke and slowly, slowly, our whole constitutional edifice has been crumbling, pillar after pillar, until the very foundations of the Constitution are now sinking into cureless ruin.

To change the metaphor, the Constitution of the United States—for which I am making what is probably for me a swan song, because I have so often wearied this House by pleading the sanctity of the Constitution that I am weary of it—is like a dead oak in a forest. It is still standing, its branches are still moving with apparent life in the wind; but it is dead at the roots, and sooner or later, some other elemental storm, such as that through which we are now passing, will come and the noble tree, under which six generations of Americans have sheltered themselves and under which they have builded the greatest and noblest and freest government in all the world, will fall forever.

It may survive in form, for we will have a President, a Congress, and a Supreme Court; but the President under this bill is not the President that was created by the Constitution. Congress is no longer the representative organ of popular will it was designed to be. The judiciary is no longer what it was expected to be.

The Constitution exists in form, but it has ceased to exist as a spirit, and as a noble spirit it never had its equal in the annals of the world. [Applause.] The man is not a patriotic American who can, without the deepest grief, see the passing of our form of government, so noble in its conception, into a dictatorship.

That word "dictator" is not my word. It was used by the chairman of the committee, but it was an apt term.

I appreciate all that the majority of the House may say as to the charming personality of the President, his unquestioned patriotism and high motives, but if you look at this bill you will see that our happy, smiling, well meaning, and courageous President will not necessarily be the actual dictator, for under this act he is given power to appoint anybody he chooses, to prescribe his compensation and duties, and to delegate all his dictatorial powers to such selected deputy.

According to common rumor, the supreme dictator of this country in the realm of industrial activity is to be Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, a West Point graduate, who is said to have drafted the draft law under the Wilson administration, which summoned men to the colors at the time of the World War and who is therefore supposed to be peculiarly qualified to dragoon the free labor of America.

He is a man of military education and some legal knowledge. It is to him that these powers will be delegated, a selection as to which the Senate will not be consulted in the manner required by the Constitution as to all important officials. The President will turn that power over to General Johnson, the power of a dictator, and he will regimentalize the employees of the country and reduce them, as Matthew Woll, the very able vice president of the American Federation of Labor, said before the Committee on Labor, to the condition of economic serfs.

There never was a truer word than that uttered by Mr. Woll, representing that great organization. The man who is to exercise the power is not a man, as to whose selection the Senate or even the House of Representatives will have any determining choice and yet he will be the most powerful official in the Nation excepting the President. General Johnson is an able man. I had the privilege of being his associate in the Great Lakes litigation. If he were as great a man as Lord John Russell according to Sidney Smith, I think it was, still I would doubt his ability to do the things expected of him by this proposed law. It was Sidney Smith, I think, who said of Lord John Russell that his confidence in his own ability was such that he would undertake simultaneously to rebuild St. Peter's Cathedral, manoeuvre the channel fleet, and operate upon a patient for a stone in the bladder, and would be ignorant of the fact, when he had tried all three, that the patient with the stone had died, that the channel fleet had sunk, and St. Peter's had tumbled into ruins. If General Johnson is of the type of the "admirable Crichton" and can tell employees of this country how long they shall work and what shall be their minimum and possibly maximum wage and whether or not the maximum output of this factory or that factory is greater or less than is permissible to the high bureaucratic despot, without injuring the economic condition of this country, then he is a type of man superior to any that we have ever produced heretofore.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman must know that the War Industries Board, which had powers no less than these we are giving the President today, was merely set up by a letter from President Wilson to Mr. Baruch, and if the War Industries Board having these powers was conducted or operated with such great efficiency and advantage to the Government why cannot this same industrial recovery board be similarly operated without hurting the Constitution?

Mr. BECK. The answer is very obvious. In the first place, the war power, when war exists, and only so long, comes into very large life and has a far greater scope when the Nation is fighting for its existence, and powers are exercised that would not be tolerable in time of peace. In the second place, the War Industries Board never had the power that is given under this act to the economic dictator of America, whoever he may be. In the third place, I cannot share the gentleman's enthusiasm over the achievements of the War Industries Board.

Mr. CELLER. I presume the gentleman recalls a letter of March 4, 1918, from Mr. Wilson to Mr. Baruch?

Mr. BECK. I do not; but the gentleman need not go farther into that. He can put it into the RECORD in his own time, because my time is running.

I would have given much to have made an adequate argument in this matter. I wanted, beyond any desire I ever had before in this House, to "rise to the height of the great argument" and to "vindicate" the Constitution of the fathers, in which I, for one, still believes as against this new constitution which is now being forced upon us in the hysteria of an economic crisis. I am satisfied that if tomorrow you pass this law and the Senate concurs, and it goes into effect, the day of its enactment will be a black day in American history. It will mark the final abdication of representative government in this country, because when you give to dictators the power over agriculture and industry, what have you left? Russia is very keen about having recognition from us, the recognition of the kind where we send an ambassador to them and they send an ambassador to us. They ought to be in a high state of jubilation today in Leningrad, because they are getting a far greater recognition than they ever had before. We are vindicating their theory of government by substituting it for our own. We are beginning a 5-year plan, and we are beginning it with the same arbitrary power. "Imitation is the sincerest form of flattery." We are imitating Moscow. We are turning our backs on Philadelphia, where the Constitution was framed, and knowingly or ignorantly we are marching toward Moscow. Its government is getting the greatest recognition that they ever had, a recognition of their methods, a recognition of their industrial outlook, a recognition of the regimentalizing of the peasant and the workman in the factory.

Our Constitution was once regarded as the noblest form of government in the annals of mankind, and so characterized by one of the greatest statesmen of the nineteenth century, Mr. Gladstone. We are abandoning it in the hysteria of the moment in order to confer absolute powers, not upon the President but upon some unknown that he selects. I

I hope my friend from New York [Mr. TABER] is right, and that there will be a reaction. I am not so sure of it. Nothing succeeds like success. Revolutions do not go backward. You can tear down in a day what it cost the fathers and succeeding generations of Americans 150 years to erect, and that is what you are doing. That it could be done with 6 hours debate and without any power of amendment is to me one of the most amazing and depressing situations I have ever seen.

Let us hope that Mr. TABER is right and that this bill will be a blessing in disguise in this respect, and that it may create a reaction. I do not mean reaction against the majority party. This question is far above partisan politics. What the majority is now proposing is the monstrous birth of the despair of the moment. We have lost our heads in the present moment of hysteria, and therefore I am not saying it in any partisan sense, but hope that when the American employer and the American employee, having derived the temporary benefit of the "thirty pieces of silver", for which the constitutional liberties of the American people are now being sold, begin to feel the shackles of this bureaucratic tyranny, they will not only revolt in an unmistakable manner, but a powerful movement will begin to bring back the Constitution of the Fathers, once the noblest form of government in the world. [Applause.]

No written form of government, however wise, can insure the perpetuity of the Union. To use the homely analogy of the founder of Pennsylvania:

Governments, like clocks, go from the motion men give them, and as governments are made and moved by men, so by men they are ruined, too. Therefore, governments rather depend upon men than men upon governments.

The same truth was expressed centuries before William Penn, in words that could be profitably written in gold upon the portals of the Capitol:

Where there is no vision the people perish.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] has again expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. KELLY.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, there is no Member who receives more pleasure than I from the enchanting speeches of my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BECK. He has just delivered one of these masterly constitutional orations, and his mellifluous voice and pleasing rhetoric have charmed us all.

Admitting all that, I say, also, that it gives me great pleasure to support the principles and policies embodied in this great measure which has aroused his forebodings. It contains more assurance of industrial recovery than any legislation considered here for the past 4 gloomy years. It deals with the disease and not with symptoms. It is a social invention adequate to match our mechanical inventions.

My colleague, Mr. BECK, is a great student of history, and summons great names in American annals to support his argument that we can do nothing to meet this creeping paralysis which threatens our national life and institutions. I am only a humble student of American history, but I believe that the George Washington who built a new order in the wilderness of his own times would not hesitate to build a new order now in the wilderness of economic conditions which surround us.

I believe that the Thomas Jefferson, who stretched the Constitution until it cracked in order to make the Louisiana Purchase for national expansion, would be the first to urge any needful action to save his Nation from industrial and economic collapse.

I believe that the Abraham Lincoln, who did not fear to meet his gigantic problems with new plans and new methods, would not fear to act now, even though new plans must be employed.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. Beck] preaches a counsel of despair. We can do nothing, for the Constitution is a great wall against our progress. I choose rather to follow a constitutional student with a vastly different philosophy, Justice Louis D. Brandeis, of the United States Supreme Court. He has said, "We do not need to amend the Constitution; we need to amend men's minds."

This bill undertakes action now. And the unmistakable approval from Americans is one of the most inspiring things in my service here. The United States Chamber of Commerce has joined hands with the Federation of Labor, which most eloquently proves that neither wrote this bill but that its provisions are fair to both. In my estimation, the American people have made up their minds that the way out of this depression lies along the pathway of partnership control of those industrial processes upon which their safety and very lives depend.

The first step to a cure is proper diagnosis. What are the evils we must fight? This bill states them clearly. They are unemployment, disorganization of industry, division between labor and management, unfair competition, absence of governmental cooperation, lowered standards of living.

In this measure it is declared to be the policy of Congress to use every resource of the Government to restore employment, to provide proper cooperation, to help establish law and order in place of anarchy in business, and to help secure the increased purchasing power which will mean higher and better standards of living.

Mr. Chairman, this is the zero hour in our long battle against depression. The people are ready to go over the top in an irresistible advance. And this measure, if wisely and courageously administered, is the double-barreled weapon powerful enough to assure the victory.

The plan provided in title I is simple, easily understood, and yet effective. Every trade and industry will be invited to organize for united action in line with the public interest. They will form associations which will adopt codes of fair competition adapted to their needs. These associations must give their full rights of representation to the smaller enterprises, and there must be no methods designed to promote monopoly.

The Federal Government's participation is not so much that of a dictator, as repeated here so often this afternoon, as that of a guide and umpire, safeguarding the rights of the public, employees, and producers. There is undoubted power, as there must be, if any effective action is to be taken, but for all right-thinking and right-acting elements in business this power will not be a mailed fist but a helping hand.

The power of organizing the governmental action is given to the President, but, of course, he will not personally administer the act. He will name an administrator, who with his board of advisers will constitute the executive body charged with acting in cooperation with each industry and coordinating all industries to reach the objective.

There is a provision that the President may establish an industrial planning and research agency to aid in carrying out his functions. This will be of vital importance in securing the multitude of facts which are essential to effecting a balanced economy. There is no highroad through the present jungle, the road must be surveyed and built. The capacity of an industry to produce goods and the demand which may be reasonably expected will require the most careful study. This research and planning group will have a great opportunity to make full contribution to the restoration of prosperity.

The executive body will doubtless name a representative for each industry who will sit in council with the industrial board named by the trade association or organization. When the code of fair competition is formulated, this representative will make his report to the administrator, thus aiding him to take proper action as to the approval or disapproval of the code.

There will certainly be a labor board to take jurisdiction over complaints and disputes which may arise in industry. This board will hold hearings and listen to the evidence presented by both sides. It will report its conclusions to the administrator who is empowered to decide. Of course, a great deal will depend upon the administration of this plan. If men of vision and courage are appointed, there will be no disappointment over the operation of the law.

Upon the approval of a code of fair competition, it becomes binding upon the trade or industry. It may cover every problem which concerns the industry. The problems vary with the industry, but there is authority for any agreements necessary to arrive at the goal of fair competition in the public interest.

Mr. Chairman, for 10 years or more almost every trade and industry has been trying to establish codes of ethics and fair practices which help build business on a better basis. They have met in convention and have earnestly sought to meet the problem of destructive competition in fair and lawful manner.

I have been present when some were adopted. I have read more than 50 codes adopted by various trade associations. They are all practically the same and they are all equally impotent. They do not have and they cannot be given, without proper supervision, a weapon powerful enough to do the work required.

I hold in my hand the code adopted by the fabricators of ornamental iron, bronze, and wire, approved by the Federal Trade Commission. It provides against the substitution of inferior materials, selling goods below cost with the intent of injuring a competitor, secret rebates, breach of contract with competitors, shipping goods which do not conform to samples, bribing buyers or employees of competitors, discrimination in price between purchasers to create monopoly, obtaining information surreptitiously as to competitors' bids, and so forth.

All these declarations against unfair practices are but a pious wish as far as results are concerned. Cutthroat competition rages through trades and industries which have adopted these rules.

What we must have is a real definition of fair competition and an effective plan for securing it in trade and industry.

This Industrial Recover Act sets up a new meaning for the term "fair competition." These codes must deal with the fundamental elements of competition under the modern industrial system if they are to carry out the purpose of this act. The four essentials in any code of fair competition are price, production, wages, and hours.

There must be agreement as to minimum price. Omit that and the door is open to all the cutthroat competition which has almost destroyed industry. The price must be fair in that it includes a just return to the producer. Establishment of a maximum price will not serve since it would permit destructive competition from that level down to zero. Under it practically all today's evils would flourish.

The code must contain agreement as to production. We are undertaking to establish a balance between production and consumption. If there is unrestrained production of goods without regard to their consumption, surplus supplies will pile up, with resultant unemployment and chaos. Each industry can work out its apportionment of production to the various units. Without doubt the past performance of each unit will be the yardstick for determining its quota of the production needed to meet the demand. As consumption increases, the production will rise in proportion.

The code must contain agreements as to wages and hours. These are mandatory under the law and will be vital to the maintenance of fair competition.

If this measure is enacted, there will be established a new and better definition of fair competition. It will include all the trade practices which have been worked out in the past.

It will also include within its scope fair prices, fair production, fair wages, and fair hours. If that kind of competition can be secured and safeguarded, the economic problem is solved.

It has not been overlooked that in almost every industry there is a minority of pirates who seek profits by attacking honest merchantmen. These racketeers have made impossible the most reasonable agreements which could be made under former laws. In this bill, for the first time in our history, there is power given to prevent those predatory practices in business which have worked injury to everybody but those who practice them. The enterprise that willfully violates the code agreed upon will be judged guilty of unfair competition within the meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act and subject to its penalties. Further, such violation shall be judged a misdemeanor and punishable by fine for each offense.

If a trade or industry refuses to organize and adopt a code of fair competition, it will not avoid its obligation to enter upon this plan of cooperation for the common good. The President, through his appointed agency, is authorized either upon his own motion or upon complaint of aggrieved parties to prescribe and approve a code of fair competition for such obstructive industry, and that code shall have the same force and effect as though submitted by the industry itself.

If anyone thinks such a provision severe let him think of the action which has been taken as to railroads, public utilities, and similar industries. Government has been compelled to establish by law the code of fair competition. That was necessary because of the effect of unrestrained action by these industries upon all other industries. Today any great industry by its refusal to set up and abide by decent standards of behavior could nullify the good intentions and purposes of other industries. Compulsion is essential in some cases, and that compulsion will be exerted.

It is further provided that the President, or the agency established by him, shall enter into agreements with and approve voluntary agreements between persons engaged in a trade or industry, labor organization, and trade or industrial associations. The only test of such an agreement is that it shall be in the public interest and consistent with the principles and policies of this measure.

If it becomes necessary to carry out the purpose of the act and if the other measures prove powerless to secure fair and square competition, there is power to establish a license system in any industry where it is needed to make a code of fair competition effective. In such a case only licensees shall engage in business affecting interstate commerce.

Mr. Chairman, the entire purpose of these provisions is to secure constructive and fair competition and to outlaw unrestrained, destructive, and antisocial competition. It is quite true that it is a departure from the philosophy embodied in the antitrust laws as interpreted for 40 years. But "new conditions teach new duties; time makes ancient good uncouth." We are in a new age which the men of 1890 could not possibly have foreseen.

Today the requirement that business shall be war is suicidal. We have drifted on the old pathway while everything changed and the pathway slipped into a swamp. Instead of dealing with business through the Department of Justice, this measure permits governmental cooperation through an agency which will help business serve its real purpose of satisfying human needs under fair conditions.

Over a year and a half ago Justice Brandeis, of the United States Supreme Court, called for an interpretation of the Constitution and the laws in keeping with modern business conditions. Here is what he said:

All agree that irregularity in employment—the greatest of our evils—cannot be overcome unless production and consumption are more nearly balanced. Many insist there must be some form of economic control. There are plans for proration; there are projects for stabilization. . . . There must be power in the States and the Nation to remold through experimentation our economic practices and institutions to meet changing social and economic needs.

It is the high purpose of those who support this legislation to help remold the industrial system for the promotion of the public welfare, even though there must be modifications of laws which have long been on the statute books.

Mr. Chairman, this measure provides that for the life of the act and for 60 days thereafter any code agreement or license issued under it shall be exempt from the provisions of the antitrust laws of the United States.

This provision must be understood in connection with the previous requirement that no code shall be designed to promote monopolies or to eliminate or oppress small enterprises or discriminate against them.

The antitrust laws have had two entirely separated effects. The first is the vitally important one of prohibiting monopoly and all coercive or oppressive tactics toward competitors, which tend to destroy competition and create monopoly.

This part of the antitrust laws remains in full force and effect. The operation of this law will be in full accord with it. In fact, it will add to the strength of the laws against monopoly. It was cutthroat competition on the part of the great corporations which led to the passage of the Sherman Act. The debates in Congress show that it was the complaints of the smaller business men against destruction through unfair practices and destructive competition that led to the enactment of the law.

However, the law has been held to prohibit agreements of beneficial kind between independent competitors. It has banned cooperation even when united action has been in the public interest.

The result has been compulsory competition of the kind which leads to the ruin of the smaller enterprise. The only remedy for excessive production is controlled production. But limitation of production cannot be accomplished by one concern any more than limitation of armament can be accomplished by one nation. There must be agreement and cooperation.

Such action on the part of independent business men has been held to be illegal and subject to criminal penalty. Of course, it affects the supply and thus the price of the commodity and is forbidden, if every agreement to restrain competition, whether in the public interest or not, is covered by the Sherman Act.

It has been so held by the courts in many cases, although every observer knows that the only effective means for industrial welfare are based upon mutual agreements of entire industries.

This bill cuts a clear pathway through the undergrowth of 40 years of legislation and judicial interpretation. It accepts the fact that competitors are practically on the same level of costs in this advanced era of manufacture, and that there is no middle ground between destructive industrial war on one hand and industrial peace through mutual agreements under the supervision of the Government.

These agreements, properly supervised, cannot lead to oppressive prices. Industry knows that the lowest prices consistent with a fair return induce greater consumption, and greater consumption in turn makes lower costs possible. We have also learned during the last 4 years that unless the industry and its pay roll are preserved there is injury done the entire public.

Mr. Chairman, the real purpose of the antitrust laws was to protect the public from unregulated monopoly power. Great consolidations of capital threatened the public welfare. Yet in our own times have come stupendous mergers which are seeking and securing the power which the law sought to guard against. This bill will remove the incentive to merger and consolidation. It will give the little independent enterprise its fair place in the industry and protect it against oppressive methods.

Under this plan of partnership control by industry and Government, there will be preserved every wholesome prohibition of the antitrust laws against monopoly and oppression. At the same time it will permit agreement for the restraint of the unfair competition which is the sure road to monopoly.

As to the attitude of the United States Supreme Court on this problem of planned and controlled industry, it is necessary to look only at the Appalachian Coals decision. That will show how far the Supreme Court will go in any effort to help bring law and order into disorganized industry.

The corporation received a Delaware charter giving it power to enter into every business known. Under that charter 137 coal corporations banded themselves together to form a sales agency which should handle the output of all the mines. They controlled 74 percent of the coal produced in their territory.

The United States district court declared this organization to be illegal under the antitrust laws. The case went up to the Supreme Court of the United States, which overruled the decision of the lower court.

The Supreme Court took into consideration the deplorable conditions in the soft-coal industry. Its decision deals with "overcapacity", "distress coal", "pyramiding of coal", "abnormal and destructive competition", "bankrupt operators", and "organized production."

The Supreme Court declared:

The fact that the correction of abuses may tend to stabilize a business or to produce fairer price levels does not mean that the abuses should go uncorrected or that cooperative endeavor to correct them necessarily constitutes an unreasonable restraint of trade.

Yet, even in declaring the plan to be legal on paper, the Supreme Court was forced to say that the actual operation of the plan might prove it to be in violation of the antitrust laws. The Court said:

The decree will be reversed and the cause will be remanded to the district court with instructions to enter a decree dismissing the bill of complaint without prejudice and with the provision that the court shall maintain jurisdiction of the cause and may set aside the decree and take further proceedings if future developments justify that course in the appropriate enforcement of the Antitrust Act.

It must be admitted that such a situation is impossible as a remedy for cutthroat competition. In the first place, 26 percent of the operators are outside the plan. They will take every opportunity to reap profits by cutting below the standards set up. There is no way of dealing with them under a voluntary agreement and their unfair practices make the plan entirely unworkable, in coal, just as in many other industries where a similar attempt has been made. In the second place, there is perpetual fear and uncertainty as to the action by the district court. If the plan really betters conditions by control of price and restraint of competition, it runs afoul of the antitrust law and must be dissolved.

However, the Supreme Court, by unanimous decision, resolved all doubts in favor of stability in industry and fair competition. It has in reality invited Congress to lay down the public policy just as we are doing it in this bill. Surely we may rely upon the desire of this great tribunal to cooperate, to the very furthest degree possible, in securing industrial recovery through reasonable partnership control.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the Nation's industries are to be revived, purchasing power must be increased. That means the employment of idle men in the tasks of production. Immediately the question of hours and wages confronts us. Hours of labor must be reduced, but wages must be increased.

Many plans have been offered for dealing with the problem of hours of labor. The Black bill provided for a 30-hour week. There have been suggestions for the 36-hour week and the 40-hour week.

The plan under this bill is not to fix a rigid schedule for every industry alike but to permit the employers and employees in each industry to work out the hours of labor best suited to the exact conditions. It is believed that collective action will result in fair adjustment of working hours and balance them with production.

Mr. Chairman, this would not be a measure for industrial recovery if it failed to deal with the workers in the industries and provide adequately for their just rights. I have heard it said that this is not the time to make any changes in labor relations, no matter how just those changes may be. The argument is that we should wait until this emergency is over before attempting to establish labor standards.

Nothing could be more illogical. This emergency is, in part, due to the neglect of the importance of fair wages and balanced hours of labor in maintaining prosperity in a machine age. Now is the best time possible to make sure that better methods will prevail in the future.

This measure undertakes to secure and preserve the right of collective action for those who invest their muscle and mind and blood and life in industry.

Section 7 is as follows:

SEC. 7. Every code of fair competition, agreement, and license approved, prescribed, or issued under this title shall contain the following conditions: (1) That employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organizations or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection; (2) that no employee and no one seeking employment shall be required as a condition of employment to join any company union or to refrain from joining a labor organization of his own choosing; and (3) that employers shall comply with the maximum hours of labor, minimum rates of pay, and other working conditions, approved or prescribed by the President.

It is the purpose to encourage the settlement of the vitally important questions of hours, wages, and working conditions by mutual agreements between organizations of employers and employees. The responsibility is put upon those who should have it. There will be no difficulty about it, granted a spirit of fair play and right thinking by both parties.

When the agreement is made and approved it will have all the sanctions of the codes of fair competition. Its provisions will be enforced against any violator who would attempt to make unjust profits out of lower standards.

If in any trade or industry there is neglect or refusal on the part of one or both parties to make mutual agreements covering these important questions, power is given the President through his agencies to investigate labor practices, wages, hours of labor, and working conditions and prescribe fair standards.

Such action will be necessary in few cases. We are giving power to employers and employees to adjust these questions and ninety-nine times out of a hundred they will do it. Mutual agreements are always easier to make when each side knows the strength of the other and respects the other.

We have heard a great deal about the evils and excesses of organized labor. The enemies of organized labor have been largely responsible. They have forced unionists to spend most of their time and efforts to secure the right to act collectively. Labor organizers have been fought by fair means and foul. They have had to deal with spies and face the attacks of a private police force. They have had to face black lists, injunctions, and vicious obstructions. It is no wonder that their tactics could not be marked by soft speech and gentle hands.

Mr. Chairman, we are here frankly recognizing the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively. It is an inherent, God-given right, and granting it without equivocation will put a solid foundation under the structure of industrial justice.

If these provisions be opposed by industrial leaders, it will prove them blind leaders. They will be joining hands with the red revolutionists who plot against the Government. They, too, are enemies of trade-unionism and against them the unions must make continual struggle. The Industrial Workers of the World opposed collective bargaining as violently as the most reactionary employer. The motto of that organization has been "the working class and the employing class have nothing in common." "Big Bill" Haywood denounced labor organizations, with their dues and sick benefits, because "when the union has something to lose, the urge for rebellion is gone."

There is constructive statesmanship in these provisions that every worker shall be free to join a labor organization of his own choosing. "Trade-unionism", said Gladstone, "is the bulwark of modern democracy." This measure, when enacted into law, will make trade-unionism in America a better instrumentality for the advancement of social justice and human freedom.

The question of the so-called "company union" is met in this measure. No worker shall be compelled to join a company union as a condition of employment, nor shall he be barred from joining another organization. The War Labor Board was compelled to take exactly that action during the World War, and to the day of its dissolution in August 1919 there was not a single strike involving an entire industry nor one of national proportions. Within 6 months after it went out of existence there were three great strikes, involving coal, steel, and railroads.

If the employees of any company or establishment of their own free will desire to be represented by fellow employees, that course will come within the definition of collective bargaining. But if they have reason to believe that the "company union" is only a subterfuge to control representatives through threat of dismissal then they will have the right to choose another organization and other representatives.

My friends, the labor union is a permanent part of our national life. It cannot and should not be destroyed. It is here to stay, for men will die for the cause it represents. This measure only requires industry to recognize the facts and to adjust itself to them in constructive fashion. There will be difficulties but only the difficulties which come with democracy. Congress is not 100 percent perfect, yet we do not propose to scrap the Government on that account.

We are attempting to stabilize industry. Of necessity there must be a place for the organization of labor, one of the most stabilizing forces in all industry. With fair wage standards and the elimination of sweat-shop wages, child labor, and other intolerable conditions, the fair and humane employer will be protected against cutthroat competition which he is powerless to meet today.

Then, too, Mr. Chairman, the passage of this bill will put renewed courage and confidence into the hearts of 1,500,000 independent merchants of this country. They have faced destructive competition and unfair practices on the part of great chain organizations, which have attained semimonopolistic power. More than 120,000 wholesale establishments will have a fairer chance to serve the public welfare by performing their necessary function in distribution under a square-deal policy.

When the Supreme Court in 1911 put the resale price agreement under the ban of the Sherman antitrust law, it unwittingly struck a deadly blow against the independent retailer. From that day to this I have urged the recall of that judicial decision and the restoration of the right to fair contract universally admitted previous to that time.

This bill gives the independent retailer his chance. His industry, one of the greatest in the Nation, cannot be forgotten if we are to build on the solid foundation of fair trade. It is not forgotten, for under the wise provisions written in this bill, the business men, who are the foundation of every local community in the land, will have their fair chance to protect themselves against cutthroat tactics in merchandising.

Mr. Chairman, title II, the public-works provisions, is an essential part of this plan for national recovery. Unemployment is the root evil, and it is against that that we make war. The only cure for unemployment is putting people to work. This bill proposes to prime the pump by putting willing workers on public construction projects. Their purchasing power will make it possible to put others back in their regular occupations and with production and consumption balanced by proper control, to keep them at work.

Almost 90 percent of the workers in the building trades are out of work today. The value of all construction in 1932 was $6,097,000 less than in 1930.

There is public work to be done by the Federal Government and in every State in the Union. We need highways, ships, buildings, river and harbor improvements. The resumption of business activity alone will produce the revenues to pay the cost; $3,300,000,000, as provided in this bill, will mean work for 3,000,000 men. That will mean new buying at the stores, new orders for the factories, new jobs for factory workers, new jobs for clerical and professional workers.

The section dealing with employment on the public works is in itself a tremendous stride forward. All the contracts let shall provide for the 30-hour week and, more important still, that the wages paid shall be compensation sufficient to provide a standard of living in decency and comfort. All the materials used shall be American-made.

That is further proof that we are serious in our effort to increase purchasing power and increase employment as the vital action necessary to win the war against depression.

There is power enough in the public-works title to turn over the wheel, and there is power enough in the industrial-recovery title to keep it turning.

Mr. Chairman, this bill does not provide funds for the charitable relief of suffering Americans, but it will provide a pay envelop for workers out of which they may support themselves and their families.

It does not provide any revision of our monetary system, but it will provide the method for putting money into circulation through the channels of business.

It does not undertake to provide credit for business, but it makes it possible for business to secure credit from banks with assurance that the loans can be repaid.

It does not aim to stimulate business by ballyhoo, but it does provide for the purchasing power needed to revive business.

It does not put control of industry solely in the hands of producers, but it gives labor its just voice and the Government guards the rights of all.

It does not undertake to cut down indebtedness, but it does offer a plan of fair prices and fair wages, so that indebtedness can be paid.

This measure seeks industrial recovery through putting people back to work in their normal occupations at wages and hours which will make a more even distribution of purchasing power.

It is protection of investors against losses from destructive policies. It imposes the responsibility of trustees upon big and little business. It offers a way to eliminate the sweat-shop and child labor. It recognizes that an era of plenty requires different policies than an age of scarcity. It is a new device big enough for a new age.

O Mr. Chairman, I know that there are those who lift up their hands in horror at the thought that we are touching with impious hands that holy of holies, the law of supply and demand. How can they face the facts of real life and still regard the "law of supply and demand" as though it had the same fixity as the law of gravitation.

It will not do to mouth these words in the presence of 30,000,000 destitute Americans whose demand for goods is pitiful while they see an overabundance of the things they desire filling bursting warehouses. These words do not carry conviction to the bankrupted soft-coal operators who see coal cut to 45 cents a ton by those who dispossessed them of their property.

It is possible to control the conditions which bring the law of supply and demand into operation. Put people back to work and let them have buying power and their demand will swamp the factories with orders. Restore purchasing power to the consuming millions who need and desire to buy goods for themselves and their families and the wheels of industry will hum with full activity. Balance production against an increasing standard of living for Americans and this depression will become only a nightmare memory.

We are undertaking to secure industrial recovery by encouraging a fairer distribution of buying power. The purpose is to accomplish that much-needed end through patriotic, business, industrial, labor, and political leadership. We are undertaking to solve the fourfold problem of production, price, wages, and hours under a sound and statesmanlike plan.

It is true that we must depend upon that intangible thing called human nature. This bill is founded in the faith that the majority of those engaged in trade and industry and the majority of those in labor organizations are men of good will, who will be satisfied with a square deal, no more and no less. It is built on the faith that the great mass of Americans have learned that our panicky present is due to our planless past and are willing to pay the price for security and stability. This bill is formulated with faith in the President of the United States and that he will administer the tremendous powers it gives him with but one purpose—the promotion of the general welfare.

Yes; it is an act of faith, comparable to that of our forefathers when they put their names to the Declaration that "all men are created equal and are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and governments are instituted to secure these rights."

If their sublime faith had been baseless, this new Nation would have speedily perished. How sound and well merited their faith is proven by 150 years eventful history.

Let us have faith. There are patriotism enough and wisdom enough and genius enough in America to execute the partnership-control plan evolved in this measure and start us toward a future that will, in material comfort, and general well-being, outstrip all the prosperity of the past. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before us is the President's bill to relieve the unemployed, that now number about 12,000,000 men. No more pitiable sight can be presented than to find a large family in want simply because the father cannot get work to do to earn a living.

We have very few indolent people. Our people do not want a dole or to have to live off of charity, but on the other hand they want to earn an honest living and only want a chance to do so. This bill will give employment to at least 6,000,000 men when it is put into operation.

The life of this bill is for a 2-year period. It is hoped, by that time, that our country will be restored to a normal condition. There are many objections that can be offered to this kind of legislation, and under normal conditions this bill would not pass this Congress. It gives entirely too much power to any one man, but we feel that our President will use it justly and not abuse it. I do not believe that Congress should delegate its power to where it might be abused, but in this emergency we must trust the President with the power given to him.

This bill seeks to correct by use of the power given the President the unfair practices that have for years been carried on by industry and to provide for a fair and just code of competition. If this can be done, industry will again prosper and men will be employed at a fair wage for a day's labor.

The States will receive under this bill $400,000,000 for roadbuilding. My State of Arkansas is a small State in comparison with some others, but it will get about $6,000,000 for roadbuilding, which will give work to our people.

Many public building will be erected under this bill. We hope to see many post-office buildings in our small cities taken care of and built. This will give employment to labor and make a demand for material.

There is one provision of this bill that I dislike very much, and that is the provision for financing it. We have authorized the President by a law passed by this Congress to expand the currency to the amount of this bill and more. I see no good sense or business judgment in paying out large sums of money as interest on bonds when we can deposit the bonds as eligible security and issue the money on them and save the interest. Under the rule adopted we cannot do that now. But I hope it will be provided for in the next Congress.

There are many features of the bill I should like to discuss, but I cannot in the time allotted to me. I do not like the provision that permits the President to redelegate some of the powers given to others. I think Congress could have worked out a much better bill than this, but we are told by your House leaders that this is the bill the administration wants and no other, and for that reason as a Democrat I am supporting the bill, in the hope that it accomplishes all the administration thinks it will accomplish. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL].

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I can hardly believe that very many Members of this House will vote against this bill. We have just listened to a very learned dissertation on the unconstitutionality of it. It is, however, little satisfaction to the man who is starving for want of the opportunity to work to tell him that he is starving to death constitutionally. [Laughter.] Men who are in the breadlines, men who are out of employment and who, under the economic conditions obtaining, are unable to secure employment, are not deeply interested in the constitutionality of an act which holds out the hope to them of returning prosperity and of returning jobs.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I wanted to make an observation while the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] was speaking. I believe what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] was saying and what the gentleman from Washington is now saying is true, and I want to add the observation that in the splendid and eloquent remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], I feel he is working from a wrong premise. The gentleman said that we were creating a dictatorship for a prosperous and wealthy industry, when, as a fact, I believe we are creating a savior for a bankrupt and prostrate industry. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. For 4 years we have been going down deeper and deeper in the bog. We have tried numerous expedients during this time in a legislative way to improve the economic conditions.

We passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act and this act has been beneficial in certain respects, but it fell far short of a complete remedy for the economic predicament in which the country found itself. We found that under the administration of that act, which was largely in the interest of extending credit, such credit as was so extended to the banks and the financial institutions did not go out into circulation and create employment, but rather was hoarded in order to render these institutions more liquid against a run on the institutions.

We had the expedient of the Federal Reserve banks going into the open markets and buying Government securities in the hope of piling up credits that might get into the commercial life of the country, with the result that the member banks selling their securities to the Federal Reserve banks simply went out and bought other Government securities, and hence no expansion of the credit or the currency resulted.

The only thing that has brought about an amelioration of conditions against the economic depression has been the inflation that has come through our going off the gold standard, and from that we have now a hopeful country, hoping that this administration may be able to do something to bring the people back to prosperity; and the legislation proposed here now is the most important part of the administration's program to rehabilitate the economic condition of the country, and in view of this fact and in view of the confidence that the people of the country have in our President, I am sure that only a very small percentage of the membership of this House will refuse to support this legislation. It is the President's bill and his plan for the rehabilitation of industry and commerce.

A great deal has been said about the small number of men who could be employed under this program, and this argument is based largely upon title II of the act or the building program under the act, in which the Government proposes to provide $3,300,000,000 to aid projects, mostly of a public character. This is the smallest item in this bill. It constitutes only the shocking blow that may serve to jar the wheel of industry off of dead center and start it revolving.

The greatest and most important part of this legislation is to be found in title I. Under title I we have what is known as "industrial control."

Mr. DIMOND. Will the gentleman from Washington yield with respect to one particular phase of the bill?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. DIMOND. As the Delegate from Alaska, I am particularly interested in the provisions with respect to the public-highway system as applied to Alaska, and I wish to ask the gentleman a question because he is a member of the Ways and Means Committee. I direct the gentleman's attention to sections 202 and 203 of the act which provide that public highways, among other public works, may be constructed in all the States, including Alaska and the District of Columbia, and so forth; and then under section 204 we have a special provision in relation to highways allotting or authorizing $400,000,000 to be spent on the highways under the provisions of this section.

I understand that this was taken up with the Director of the Budget when he appeared before the committee I think, in executive session, with respect to whether the provisions of section 204 would prevent the construction of highways in the Territories, particularly the Territory of Alaska under the provisions of sections 202 and 203 of the act. I would like to have the gentleman give me any information he has upon this point.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The Director of the Budget said it was his opinion that it did not, that under sections 202 and 203 you might have money for highway construction in the Territory of Alaska, but not coming out of the $400,000,000 allocated to the States.

Mr. DIMOND. Is that the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is my opinion, too.

Now, the most important part of the legislation is in title I, providing for industrial recovery. Under title II an amount to $3,300,000,000 may be expended by the Government in financing public enterprises and enterprises semi-public.

Under title I it is hoped and expected by the sponsors of the legislation to rehabilitate industry, so that under that title there will probably be thirty or forty billion dollars expended in the industrial program, and when industry is rehabilitated you will find that the greatest percentage of reemployment of the idle men in our country today will be in the industries, trades, and commerce.

It has been objected that this legislation suspends the operation of the antitrust law. The prime purpose of the antitrust law is to preserve fair competition in trade and industry and to preserve that fair competition against organized monopolies.

I say to you that the purpose of title I of this bill, which suspends for a certain time the antitrust law, promotes the spirit of the antitrust law itself because we propose here to add to or supplement existing law designed to preserve conditions of fair competition. The antitrust law does not take into consideration unfair competition resulting from the exploitation of labor. It has developed that that is the greatest factor in unfair competition that confronts industry today.

This bill proposes to make that one of the factors in arriving at the basis of fair competition and to protect labor in a living wage and protect industry that pays a living wage against other industries less scrupulous that take advantage of necessitous conditions to exploit labor and say, "You must take the wages we offer or you will have no job."

I say that in preserving the conditions of fair competition, even though it suspends in part the operation of the antitrust law, does in fact support the main objective of the antitrust law—namely, the preserving of fair competition. That is the whole gist of title I, and its whole purpose is the increasing of employment in industry and securing a living wage to labor. When labor has a living wage, you have increased the purchasing capacity of the masses of the people, and built up a market for industry.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. The gentleman's committee authorizes an agent to carry out the purposes of the legislation and set up and regulate the hours of labor and fix a minimum wage. In view of the holdings of the Supreme Court, what has the gentleman to say as to the expectation that these provisions of the act will be sustained and upheld?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I do not share the alarm of my friend from Georgia in that regard.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman expect the Court to hold it is within the power of Congress to fix a minimum wage and regulate hours of labor in private industry which in no way affects the public interest?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I do not admit the gentleman's premise that it "in no way affects the public interest." This legislation is based on the constitutional provision found in the commerce clause and in the general welfare clause.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman construe the commerce clause to vest power in the Congress to regulate trade wholly and entirely dissociated from actual interstate commerce?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Again, I cannot assume the premise that the gentleman proposes. This bill is so carefully drawn that that question does not enter into the discussion. Title I of this bill relates only to interstate commerce.

Mr. COX. But does the gentleman construe the term "interstate commerce" to mean the right to control any traffic entering commerce from the point of origin or production to the point of distribution?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Provided it becomes interstate in its transportation and in its commerce.

Mr. COX. In other words, does the gentleman construe the commerce clause to mean that Congress has the power to extend its control over any article entering the channels of trade—that is, interstate commerce—back to the point of origin or production. Let me make myself plain.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Please do not take up too much of my time.

Mr. COX. But the gentleman is discussing a very important question.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman has time coming to him in his own right.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Let me suggest that the powers granted herein are discretionary, and it is an academic question to pick out some isolated product and ask whether it comes within the purview of the act. The discretion is given the President of the United States, and I might say to those who are alarmed, that we all know that an emergency exists, that the economic structure has fallen, and this power is only for temporary emergency purposes.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I must ask the gentleman to use his own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we all know this legislation is of an emergency character, that it is proposed to meet the most emergent situation in which this country has ever found itself. It is temporary; it is self-eliminating, confined to the period of 2 years, unless sooner terminated by proclamation of the President or by a joint resolution of Congress. The labor interests of the country, the industrial interests of the country, the agricultural interests of the country, are willing to take a chance on the constitutionality of it, and, personally, I am not alarmed at these great barriers which our friends seek to erect against the legality of the proposed legislation. I am willing to try it, and I believe you are willing to try it, and in this great emergency I doubt very seriously whether the courts would contemplate barring action by the Government to bring us out of the situation which means ruin and destruction of the Government itself, unless it is remedied. What boots it if we have our Constitution maintained in what we think was its original integrity, if civilization under it crumbles and falls?

We must meet these new conditions, and we all know that the courts have construed exceptional legislative provisions with a view of developing progress and the provisions of the Constitution to fit the conditions of society as they have developed.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I decline to yield; I have not the time. I claim that the big thing in this bill is title I, which, if it works out as its sponsors hope it will, will put to work millions of men and will bring about the expenditure of billions of dollars. The public-works program provided for in the bill will be limited to the amount specified, namely, $3,300,000,000. Title I carries out the exact purpose of the antitrust laws in maintaining conditions of fair competition. It carries out the idea in the Federal Trade Act that provides machinery for enforcing methods of fair competition. It is in conformity with the Weights and Measures Act and with the standard of money and with all of these acts that have been passed by Congress to preserve conditions of fair competition.

There is nothing new in principle in this title I. It simply carries out the purpose that has been running through statutes since the Interstate Commerce Act was passed, back in the eighties, and it does not conduce to monopoly. It is specifically provided in the bill that under the supervision of the administrator or the President monopoly shall not be permitted to grow up. It must in its codes of fair competition be representative of the industries affected, so that big and small alike may have the same benefits. There is no discrimination, no opportunity for monopoly. There is no opportunity for suppressing small industry, and there is a provision for protecting labor and for protecting the industries which employ labor at a living wage. If you carry out that condition, you will start the wheels of industry turning in this country and we will have the people back on an earning basis, on the basis of purchasing power. That is what the bill proposes to do. This bill has the unqualified and wholehearted endorsement of the American Federation of Labor, as voiced by President Green, of that organization, before the Ways and Means Committee; and Donald H. Richberg, for many years attorney for the railway-labor organizations, helped to write the bill, and, in fact, wrote practically all of the industrial-control feature embraced in title I.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

If monopoly is not contemplated, then why the proposal to set aside the antitrust law?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The antitrust law is not set aside as to monopolies. It is suspended for the purpose of enabling trade associations and industries to enter into trade agreements under the supervision of the administrator for the protection of labor against starvation wages and for the protection of legitimate industry against sweatshop competition.

Prevention of unfair competition and unfair methods of competition is the object of: (1) Antitrust laws; (2) Interstate Commerce Commission Act; (3) Federal Trade Commission Act; (4) Weights and Measures and Standards Acts. And the purpose of title I of this bill is to prevent unfair competition by preventing the exploitation of labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Under leave to extend my remarks I submit the following brief analysis of the bill:

TITLE I

Section 1: Declaration of policy.

Section 2: Administration agencies.

Section 3: Codes of fair competition. (a) Approval of such codes by the President.

(1) When no inequitable restrictions are imposed on admission to membership, and that those presenting such code to the President are fairly representative of such trades or industries.

(2) That such codes are not designed to promote monopolies or to eliminate or oppress small enterprises (spirit of antitrust laws is preserved hereunder).

(b) Upon approval of such code by the President such code shall be the standards of fair competition in commerce for such trade or industry.

(c) Terms of code of fair competition enforceable through Federal district courts.

(d) President may prescribe and approve a code of fair competition where the trade or industry has not presented such code to him on its own initiative. Public notice and hearing prerequisite for such action by President.

Section 4 (a): President authorized to enter into voluntary agreements between or among persons engaged in trade or industry, labor organizations, and trade or industrial organizations, associations, or groups, if such agreements will aid in effectuating the policy of title I with respect to interstate commerce and will not promote monopolies or oppress small business enterprises.

(b) President may require business licenses in order to effectuate a code of fair competition or an agreement under this title. Such license requirements shall be imposed only after public notice and hearing and a proclamation of such requirement.

Section 5: During the effective period of title I and for 60 days thereafter any approved code, agreement, or license thereunder exempts from the provisions of the antitrust laws.

Section 6: Limitation of benefits.

(a) Trade or industrial association or group must furnish to President such information as he by regulation may prescribe.

(c) Where no such agreement has been approved by the President, he may investigate the labor practices, policies, wages, hours of labor, and working conditions in a trade or industry and, after hearings, may prescribe a limited code of fair competition fixing the maximum hours of labor, minimum rates of pay, and other working conditions in such trade or industry.

Section 8: This title shall not be construed as repealing or modifying any of the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, approved May 12, 1933.

Section 9: (a) President is empowered to prescribe necessary rules and regulations to carry out the purposes of this title, and fees for licenses and for filing codes of fair competition. The violation of any such rule or regulation is punishable by fine or imprisonment or both.

(3) Grants the power of eminent domain to acquire necessary real or personal property in connection with the construction of such project and providing that all moneys received by way of repayment of loans or from sales of securities and lease of properties shall be applied to retirement of the bonds to be issued to finance the building program.

(4) Provides aid in financing such railroad maintenance and equipment as may be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission as desirable for the improvement of transportation facilities.

Proviso: To render a State, county, or municipality eligible for the 30-percent grant herein, it may be required to show that its ordinary expenditures are prudently within its estimated revenues.

(b) All expenditures of officers and employees in connection with a particular project shall be charged to the amount allocated to such project.

(c) Sections 305 and 306 of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, as amended, shall apply in the acquisition of lands or sites for Federal public buildings.

Section 204, public highways: (a) $400,000,000 provided for emergency construction of public highways granted to the States.

(c) Provides that all contracts involving the expenditure of such highway funds shall specify minimum rates of wages which contractors shall pay skilled and unskilled labor and that such minimum rates shall be stated in the call for bids and shall also be stated in the bids for the work.

(d) Removes the limitation, as to the expenditure of these funds, in the Federal Highway Act, approved November 9, 1921, as amended and supplemented, upon highway construction, and so forth, and upon payments per mile which may be made from Federal funds.

Section 205 provides that all contracts for construction projects and all loans and grants hereunder shall contain such provisions as are necessary to insure—

(1) That no convict labor shall be employed upon such project;

(2) That, so far as practicable, no individual directly employed on any such project shall work more than 30 hours in any one week;

(3) That all employees shall be paid wages sufficient to provide, for the hours of labor as limited, a standard of living in decency and comfort; and

(4) That preference shall be given, where they are qualified, to ex-service men with dependents.

Section 206 authorizes the President to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this title, and makes the violations of any such rule or regulation punishable by fine or imprisonment or both.

Section 207 provides through bond issues the raising of the moneys necessary to the projects authorized under this act and also provides an addition to the existing sinking fund of the Government $2\frac{1}{2}$ percent of the amount authorized to be expended under this act, and appropriates such additional sinking fund money for each fiscal year, beginning with the fiscal year 1934, to pay the interest on the bonds to be issued hereunder and to retire such bonds at maturity.

Section 208 provides additional taxes to meet the interest and sinking fund requirements necessary to service the bond issues herein authorized in the estimated amount of $220,000,000 a year.

Section 209 authorizes the appropriation of $3,300,000,000 for the purposes of this act.

TITLE III

Amendments to Emergency Relief and Construction Act and miscellaneous provisions.

Section 301: Transfer from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the administrator under this act the powers and functions enumerated under and in connection with section 201 (a) of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932, as amended.

Section 302 reduces the total amount of all obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized under section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, to have outstanding at any one time by $1,200,000,000.

This reduction is made because of the projects under section 201 (a) of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932 being transferred to the jurisdiction of the administrator under this act.

Section 303 is the separability provision.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include in connection therewith a publication containing a statement made recently by the Secretary of Labor.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, the bill before the House proposes to place the entire control of every character of trade or industry in the United States within the control of agencies to be set up by the President; to authorize the expenditure of $3,300,000,000 in a public-works program to be directed by an administrator appointed by the President; to levy an additional tax burden of $220,000,000 per annum upon the people; and to offer to the people relief from this tax burden if they will repeal the eighteenth amendment. It was impossible for me to secure time for a detailed discussion of its provisions. A decent regard for the opinions of the people I represent, and a profound respect for our great President in whose name the measure is being urged, requires that I should briefly state the reasons which impel me to vote against it.

The industrial control title of the bill would authorize such agencies as the President may set up, either upon the application of a portion of a trade or industry supposed to be representative of it, or of some branch of it, or "upon his own motion", to fix regulations for the Government of that trade or industry, which "shall contain * * * maximum hours of labor, minimum rates of pay, and other working conditions." Licenses may be required of "business enterprises", and if not secured or if revoked, anyone who carries on such enterprise shall be guilty of a crime. In other words, no man could carry on a business of trade or industry without complying with such regulations covering wages, hours of labor, and working conditions as might be prescribed, and without securing, if required, a license from the Federal Government. The bill is far beyond the provisions of the Black 6-hour bill, in which it was proposed for Congress to legislate on the subject of hours of labor. In this bill it is proposed that Congress delegate the power to legislate, not merely to the President, but to "such officers, agents, and employees as he may designate or appoint"; and not merely with reference to hours of labor, but with reference to the entire field of industrial operation and control.

The Supreme Court of the United States has clearly said in the child-labor decision, and reaffirmed in subsequent decisions that I shall not take time to cite, that Congress has no power to enact any such legislation. Waiving aside the question of the right of Congress to delegate to the executive branch of the Government its legislative authority, the legislation touches a subject matter that under the Constitution is purely within State control. In the case of Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U.S. 251) the Supreme Court said:

The manufacture of goods is not commerce, nor do the facts that they are intended for, and are afterward shipped in, interstate commerce make their production a part of that commerce subject to the control of Congress. The power to regulate interstate commerce was not intended as a means of enabling Congress to equalize the economic conditions in the States for the prevention of unfair competition among them. * * * It was not intended as an authority to Congress to control the States in the exercise of their police power over local trade and manufacture, always existing and expressly reserved to them by the tenth amendment.

There are no words in the English language to make the proposition plainer. No lawyer can read that language and say that under its meaning Congress can control, or authorize anybody else to control, the manufacture of goods in your State or mine, and everything incident to their manufacture, merely because those goods are to be shipped in interstate commerce. The fact that it was a 5-to-4 decision makes no difference. It is the law of the land until it is overruled. And as a Member of Congress, sworn to uphold the Constitution, I can do no less than accord to it the meaning which has been given it by the highest court in the land.

It is sought to differentiate this bill from the character of legislation the Supreme Court says is unconstitutional, upon the ground that it is an emergency measure. I defy any gentleman to point out any provision of the Constitution, or any decision of the Supreme Court, construing it, which authorizes the conclusion that the existence of an emergency vests in Congress the right to exercise power over matters expressly reserved to the States by the tenth amendment.

If I felt that there is a chance the Supreme Court might uphold this legislation, I should oppose it all the more strongly. I shall not take part in the establishment of a precedent under which any Congress in future, perhaps a Congress inimical to my section of the country, perhaps a Congress in whose councils the manufacturing interests of other sections may have a voice and those of my section have none, may impose any character of restricting, hampering, ham-stringing legislation it desires upon the manufacturers of my State. We shall not always have a President Roosevelt; it is conceivable that at some time in the future we might have another Republican administration; and I tremble to think what the cotton manufacturers of New England, who have long been jealous of the gradual transfer of that industry to the South, might do to southern textile manufacturers under a Republican administration if a precedent like this is established and upheld by the courts. If we can do this, we can do anything we want with regard to goods that are to be shipped in interstate commerce. We can say to the cotton farmer, "Neither you nor anyone for you, shall work more than 3 hours, or 5 hours, or 6 hours a day; you shall not pay your hired hand less than $3 per day—if you do, it will be a crime to transport the cotton you raise in interstate commerce." Perhaps no Congress would ever go to such extremes, but I shall not be one to vote in favor of saying that Congress has the right, if it desires, to regulate all matters of that sort.

Who are the agencies that will be selected to make these laws regulating manufacture in the States? Who have been the agencies most prominent in urging them before committees in Congress? Can any Member of Congress point to a more outstanding person of this type than the honorable Secretary of Labor, Miss Frances Perkins? What is her attitude toward the people and industries of my section; what does she know about their condition? With profound regret, but as a matter of duty, I call attention to an Associated Press dispatch quoting her views as delivered before an audience in New York on May 22:

[From the Atlanta Constitution, May 22, 1933]

"SOUTH BAREFOOT", FRANCES PERKINS—LABOR SECRETARY SEES SOCIAL REVOLUTION WITH WEARING OF SHOES

NEW YORK, May 22.—Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins declared today that the administration program of strengthening consumers' buying power may build up "a new kind of civilization." She addressed the girls' work section of the Welfare Council, of New York City.

"We recognize," she said, "that our mass-production system cannot go on unless we consciously build up the purchasing power of the people who work in this country and we are recognizing that out of the building up of this purchasing power—by artificial or other means—may come a blessing beyond anything we in our generation have ever dared to dream of."

As an example, Miss Perkins cited the South as a market for shoes.

"Those of you who have lived all your lives in communities where the wearing of shoes is a commonplace," Miss Perkins said, "have, perhaps, forgotten how important and significant a social contribution are shoes."

"When you realize the whole South of this country is an untapped market for shoes, you realize we haven't yet reached the end of the social benefits and the social goods that may come from the further development of the mass-production system on a basis of consuming power in the South which will make possible the universal use of shoes in the South."

"I have said in the last few weeks, as we have been discussing the bills in Washington which have been proposed for the revival of industry and which, among other things, provide for the fixing of hours of work and for the fixing of minimum rates of pay, that if the minimum rates of pay and the hours of work could be fixed in the southern mills and in the southern employments generally, that those who wanted to get rich quick ought to buy a shoe factory, for the opportunity of buying shoes by people who may have their wages for the first time in a generation come up to the level of living wages is perfectly enormous and a social revolution can take place if you put shoes on the people of the South."

To one having knowledge of conditions in the South the statement of the honorable Secretary would be merely ridiculous if it did not disclose such pitiable and dangerous ignorance of the South and its people on the part of one who is undertaking to direct legislation vitally touching the manufacturing interests of the whole country.

The clear inference from her statement is that the wearing of shoes is an exception rather than a rule in the South, which, according to her, is "an untapped market for shoes", and that the passage of this legislation "will make possible the universal use of shoes in the South." How must the intelligent, high-class laboring population of the South, the people who toil in its factories and on its farms, and who compare exceedingly favorably with those of other sections of the country, appreciate having legislation drafted for them and which will doubtless be, in part, administered for them by a woman who knows so little about them that she can picture them as a whole pacing the highways of the South unshod? Let me assure the honorable Secretary that the people of the South are doubtless just as familiar as she with the use of shoes, although if she comes South in the summer we might have to hide our barefoot boys in order to avoid the breath of her condemnation; but heaven help us if we must have the teeming millions who work in our industries and their destinies controlled, in whole or in part, by people who have as little knowledge of them as she shows by her statement.

I prefer to leave the industries of my State and their workers to the control of their own laws, and to the rights guaranteed to them under the Constitution. No man in the world more deeply sympathizes with labor than I do. I come from the ranks of labor. When, as a very young man, I went to our State legislature, I was instrumental in having written upon the statute books of Georgia a law restricting the hours of labor in cotton and woolen mills. But I shall insist upon the right of my people to make their own laws in a field where the Supreme Court of the United States has said the Federal Government has no right to come.

I have not discussed the public works or tax features of the bill. If it is good statesmanship to endeavor to relieve unemployment through Government work, if the Government can properly furnish enough people work to contribute enough aid toward the solution of the unemployment problem to justify it, the public works program is warranted, but even without the industrial control feature I have discussed, I should want, if I had the opportunity under the rule, to propose amendments assuring that this tremendous sum of money would be evenly distributed throughout the country, and that my people would not be taxed to pay for billions of dollars worth of improvements going largely to other sections of the country. But the rule does not permit me to offer an amendment.

Not long ago we passed a relief bill carrying half a billion dollars, and the first allocations of money thereunder sent two and one half million dollars to Illinois and $40,000 to Georgia. I hope further distributions under it will be more equitable, but in the case of this appropriation of over $3,000,000,000, I for one am unwilling to leave it entirely to hope. I question whether the benefit from the public-works program will equal the evil of a heavy additional tax burden in this time of distress, and especially am I concerned about that portion of the tax part of the bill by which you propose to continue the nuisance taxes beyond the fiscal year 1934. But, under your rule, you will not allow this House to do what you know it would do if it had the chance and amend this bill so as to correct this situation. You will not allow us to say, if we must have additional taxes, what kind of taxes we prefer. We must swallow the bill whole, from stem to stern, without amendment, or else vote against it all, and since I cannot swallow its head there is no use to debate whether I could swallow its tail, especially that little stinger on the end of its tail by which you offer the American people to relieve them of a $220,000,000 tax burden if they will repeal the eighteenth amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, the measure we are now considering is a part of the administration's economic-recovery program, and was reported out by the Ways and Means Committee without a dissenting vote. During the hearings our committee had before it Director of the Budget Douglas; Assistant Attorney General Donald R. Richberg; Senator Robert F. Wagner; William Green, president American Federation of Labor; Henry I. Harriman, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States; Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale University; leaders in agriculture and industry—in fact, we heard everyone who had constructive suggestions to offer, and to one and all the committee is deeply indebted.

In the consideration of the measure itself partisanship was laid aside and every member thereof was animated by but one purpose—to give to the President every possible cooperation in his program to bring to an early termination the devastating depression which has hung like a pall over the entire world the past 4 years. May I be pardoned if at this point I pay a deserved tribute to our beloved chairman, Mr. DOUGHTON, for his unfailing fairness and courtesy during the long and arduous hearings.

Other and older members of the committee have spoken of its tax features; therefore I shall content myself with a brief outline of some other aspects of what I consider one of the most important and perhaps revolutionary measures ever to come before an American Congress. To those who would say that this bill confers too great powers upon the President, let me say that the necessity for strong and centralized power is most necessary if we are to have an early recovery.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. COX. The gentleman speaks of this being revolutionary in character. Does the gentleman mean by that that it is revolutionary in that it runs counter to the provisions of the Constitution?

Mr. KNUTSON. I am not a lawyer, so I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that I cannot discuss the legal phases of this legislation.

Mr. COX. What does the gentleman mean when he says it is revolutionary?

Mr. KNUTSON. That its provisions are different from that of any other legislation that has ever come before a Congress, to my knowledge.

Mr. COX. Different in what respect?

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, in a number of respects, and if the gentleman will read the bill and the hearings—

Mr. COX. I have read the bill and I think I understand it quite as well as the gentleman. I have read the hearings and I can get nothing out of them except a recitation of the contents of the bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, that is a matter of opinion.

Then, too, it is well to bear in mind that this legislation is but for 2 years and less if the emergency shall have passed before that time.

Primarily, the bill now before us is an employment measure, in that its aim is to bring about an increase in employment at wage levels that will restore normal living conditions as they existed in our land prior to the depression. It is sought to bring this about through cooperative action within industry itself, and by the undertaking of a gigantic public-works program, the entire cost of which may run as high as $3,300,000,000, although it is not anticipated that this staggering sum will be required, for it is our thought and hope that the very passage of this legislation will so restore confidence as to make necessary the spending of but a fraction of this sum authorized.

As has been pointed out by preceding speakers, this legislation will be made effective through voluntary codes and agreements entered into by groups engaged in the same industry or trade. It is designed to prevent cutthroat competition and unfair trade practices; to shorten hours of toil and the establishment of minimum wage scales in certain industries and trades, thereby giving a better and more profitable distribution of work; by protecting the small and weak against the strong and powerful.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I should like to know how much of the $3,300,000,000 the gentleman expects will be spent?

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not know, but it was testified before our committee—

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. A relatively small amount?

Mr. KNUTSON. That the amount spent under this bill would probably result in 14 or 15 times as much being spent throughout the country by individuals.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. But of the $3,300,000,000, the gentleman thinks only a small part will be expended?

Mr. KNUTSON. Of course, not a small part. The gentleman must bear in mind there have only been one billion minutes since the dawn of the Christian era, so that any part we spend here will not be an inconsiderable amount. I anticipate there will probably be a couple of billion dollars spent under this legislation.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. May I suggest it was testified before the committee that there would be more than $2,500,000,000 spent in the first 12 months after it went into operation.

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes. I thank my colleague.

Mr. COX. But the gentleman will agree—

Mr. KNUTSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope the Democratic leader will give my good friend from Georgia some time. The gentleman consumed much of the time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL].

Mr. COX. Was not the gentleman enlightened as a result of the questions propounded to the gentleman referred to?

Mr. KNUTSON. Somewhat.

Mr. COX. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. As much as I expected.

Mr. SWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield briefly.

Mr. SWICK. Are these public works self-liquidating projects?

Mr. KNUTSON. Not all. Save for the road-building allocation that which is allocated for public works is self-liquidating. That is, $400,000,000 is given outright to the States without the States being obliged to match it dollar for dollar, as has been the case heretofore, but under the provisions of this legislation the Government may advance to the political subdivisions moneys for public improvements such as sewage-disposal plants, waterworks, and other things, and under the provisions of this act the President may make an outright grant or donation of up to 30 percent of the amount which the municipality will secure.

Mr. SWICK. Without any idea that the projects are self-liquidating?

Mr. KNUTSON. No.

Mr. THOM. They will be by taxes.

Mr. KNUTSON. It is thought that 70 percent will be repaid to the Government by reason of provision being made for collection through taxes on waterworks, sewage-disposal plants, and so forth.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. If my friend will not make his question too complicated. I am not a lawyer.

Mr. BECK. My question will be a very simple one. Can the gentleman conceive any power the President could not exercise under this statute?

Mr. KNUTSON. The powers granted are very broad, I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but we hope it will not be necessary for the President to use all of them.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman be good enough to yield to me for one question, not a question of law?

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it a question of fact?

Mr. COX. It is a question of fact; yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. It is a question I think the gentleman can answer. So far as the effect of this proposed legislation upon the property and lives of the citizen, of the individual, is concerned, title II and the rest of the titles of the bill are inconsequential in comparison with the provisions of title I.

Mr. KNUTSON. I agree with the gentleman as to title I. It is very broad. There is no question about it.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. There is no obligation placed in this bill requiring anyone to expend the total of $3,300,000,000, or even half of that amount.

Mr. KNUTSON. No.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. In other words, any part of it may be expended, but all of it need not be expended.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is true.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. KVALE. If the $3,300,000,000 will not be expended this year, why, then, is it necessary to raise the total increment of taxes to pay interest and amortization on the whole amount?

Mr. KNUTSON. It was explained in the hearings. Has my colleague read the hearings?

Mr. KVALE. No; I have only read them in part.

Mr. KNUTSON. It is explained that it is not proposed to issue these bonds all at one time. It will take 2 years to expend any considerable part of the money that we are making available, and the bonds will be sold only as need arises for the money to put into effect the provisions of this legislation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Right here I desire to quote from a colloquy between Senator WAGNER and myself as it is found on page 103 of the committee hearings:

Mr. KNUTSON. Senator, may I direct your attention to section 3, on page 4, lines 5 and 6, especially to the words "trade or industry"? In your opinion, would this legislation provide greater protection for small, independent merchants against unfair trade practices than under existing law?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. There is no question about that?

Senator WAGNER. There is no question about that. The big fellow can take care of himself. I think essentially this is the salvation of the small business man. He will be protected by a code.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will this legislation do what it has been said would be done under the so-called "Capper-Kelly bill"?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. You have no doubt about that?

Senator WAGNER. I have no doubt about that. I want to acknowledge here Congressman KELLY's aid in the consideration and the drafting of this legislation. He was at some of our meetings and made some very valuable contributions in the drafting of this legislation. He has been a student of this subject for a long while.

Under the provisions of this measure, if properly and wisely applied and enforced, industry will benefit greatly, in that its operation will do away with unfair and ruinous competition. During the depression unfair trade practices have returned which we thought had been banished from our land for all time. Sweatshops and starvation wages are again with us, and in some lines wages have been reduced to as low as $1 per day. This situation can be cured by the measure now before us. Industries will be enabled to get together and act in a manner that will restore them to normal levels. In this connection I refer you to pages 60 and 61 of the hearings, wherein Mr. Richberg points out what I consider a very important angle of the bill.

Under this legislation we are setting up a cooperative machine with the Government as mediator. I assume that zones will be fixed for manufacturing and commerce so as to avoid unnecessary transportation and needless duplication and competition.

The measure allocates 400 millions to the several States for road construction, and it will not be necessary for the States to match this money as they have in the past.

As to the method of raising the money with which to carry out this gigantic and unparalleled undertaking, let me say that only in this one respect was I in disagreement with my colleagues on the committee. It was my thought that we should finance this program through the issuance of non-interest-bearing Treasury notes and by the imposition of an excise tax on importations of vegetable oils and seeds now coming in duty-free, which would greatly aid agriculture. I felt that we could have secured at least fifty millions from that source alone and that we should have done so. Then, too, I am opposed to a Federal tax on gasoline, for I believe that tax should be left to the States for road building and maintenance; but, even with these differences, I have no hesitancy in giving the measure my whole-hearted support and the President will have my best wishes for its successful operation. We are all Americans first, and our first and principal concern is the speedy and complete return of prosperity to our stricken country, and to that object we will all work, regardless of any partisan differences that may exist among us. Mr. Roosevelt's program is unique and courageous, and it deserves to win in the biggest possible way. By working together whole-heartedly I am hopeful that it will contribute greatly to early restoration of our well-being. Those who labored to bring this legislation into its present form deserve the Nation's gratitude. In supporting this legislation I am thinking of the idle factories and the millions who are unemployed and hungry. I am also thinking of the American farmer who is now compelled to sell his products at prices far below production costs. With a revival in industry and restored purchasing power of the consumer, the benefits of this legislation should seep into every nook and corner of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I shall be pleased to.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman know who are the real authors of the bill?

Mr. KNUTSON. It is our understanding this legislation was drafted by a considerable number of authorities. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] helped to draft the particular section I have just explained.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman put in the RECORD the names of the different persons who participated in the drafting of this legislation?

Mr. KNUTSON. I suggest that the gentleman from Mississippi get this information from the President.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROWE].

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman, the industrial recovery bill now under consideration is a bill of the first magnitude. In my opinion, it will be a master stroke and will go further toward industrial recovery and to aid in the return to prosperity, more than in any other possible way.

We have been told since the beginning of this panic that a condition existed equal to and as bad as a state of war. Since that statement was made by those in high authority in the Government some 2 or 3 years ago, conditions steadily and rapidly grew worse and reached the climax on March 3, 1933. Up to that time we had had a program of inactivity excepting methods dealing solely with the larger units of our Government and of our country.

It is not my purpose to at this time either commend or condemn the things that were done, but in spite of the agencies brought into play conditions steadily grew worse, and they grew worse for the reason that things which are the backbone of the country and the backbone of ours or any nation were given no attention. Those two great agencies were the farmer and labor of the country. If and unless you have activity and prosperity in those two agencies, all other reliefs are futile and like pouring sand in a bottomless pit; it goes in and disappears. Since that time continuous activity has been had with the result—a slight, slow, gradual, but certain upturn in business and recovery.

We say a condition exists equal to the emergency of war. Many say the condition is worse than war. What would we do in case of war? If our flag should be fired upon at sea, if our ships should be sunk, if a declaration of war was declared against us by some major nation, or our shores invaded, would we sit idly by or lie supinely on our backs of indifference and wait to see if they would not get ashamed or if they would not cease their attacks? No; we would do nothing of the kind. We would do as we have done in the past wars. The President would send a message to Congress stating the facts and an outline of the situation. Congress would declare war. They would vote a billion dollars, two billion dollars, five billion dollars; yes, and come back for another five billion dollars if necessary. Patriotic appeals would be made to people with money to buy bonds to prosecute the war, and we would spend many billions of dollars for destructive purposes to destroy life and property and to preserve our national honor.

I am not, mind you, opposing such a plan. I am making a simple statement of fact of what our Government would do in a case of war, yet in a calamity, which many say is equal to or worse than war, we sit idly by all these months and years, and now at last, with our courageous leader, a man of vision and a man of action, we are asked for legislation which will give employment to those hungry and unemployed.

It is preposterous to think of having good times and prosperity with 12,000,000 unemployed. It cannot be done. The intention of the administration, I am told, is that by the aid of this legislation some 3,000,000 men will be given employment. That means that another 3,000,000 men back of the lines will be employed in making, preparing, and moving the things which will be used in this program.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Among the things which will be done to create employment, and one of the most important things under the program, will be the public-building construction, which will have immediate action. Under this industrial recovery bill at least $150,000,000, it is said, will be used for immediate public building. The question is asked, How much will that aid labor? In answering, it is safe to say that from 80 to 90 percent of every dollar spent on this building program will go for labor either directly or indirectly. Furthermore, from dependable statistics, it is shown that 25 percent of every dollar spent for public building goes to railroad freight transportation, which is almost all labor. Moreover, the need of the industry is greater than almost any other industry; in fact, in the building trades, according to the Alexander Hamilton Institute of Chicago, only 14.7 percent of those engaged in the building trades had employment during the first 3 months of this year—hence the necessity of relief employment to that industry.

One cannot subscribe to every provision of this bill. It is impossible to enact legislation satisfactory in every respect to all. I can see no reason why there should be additional expense for interest for a bond issue for industrial recovery legislation. This program should be met by an expansion of the currency and only a sufficient amount of revenue be raised to retire this currency within a reasonable period—say 25 years—and a sinking fund of 4 percent per annum of this amount to retire this issue within 25 years. I see no reason to throw an additional $100,000,000 or more per annum into the coffers of the big bankers of the Nation, who, it is shown by recent disclosures, are not in any sense of the word good American citizens, but in reality profiteers, tax evaders, who not only dodge their own taxes but help others to do likewise. The mechanics for the investigation and collection of income tax due our Government by the bigger interests of the country would no doubt afford sufficient revenue to retire this issue of currency by at least 4 percent per annum. But time is the essence of this legislation and I am wholeheartedly in favor of this plan of giving employment. It is not only humanitarian but it is in the interest of good and sound government. People will not always continue to be patient when poverty is gnawing at their vitals and when the wolf is standing at their door. In a land of plenty, too much wheat, too much corn, too much cotton, too much coal, too many houses, yet with millions hungry, scantily clothed, suffering with cold in the winter, and without homes. Good government and a constitution for the people require and demand that the Government step in and do what capital of the country should do, but refuses to do.

This public-works program will be the real starter, in my opinion, of a return to prosperity. When that prosperity returns our national debt should be speedily wiped out by a generous amount of the profits and excess profits graded up as the incomes increase, with the intent and purpose in mind that when another period like this arises that not only will our national debt be paid but that a large nest egg be on hand in the Federal Government's Treasury to again do what we are starting to do now, only on a magnified scale. In other words, our Government should do for its people what the provident, good man does for his family. He accumulates, he pays his debts when times are good. He lays by for a rainy day. At least the leaders of our country should have as much common sense as Joseph and the rulers of Egypt had some thousands of years ago. They filled their granaries during the 7 years of plenty, knowing that they would be followed by a drought. When the drought came they had plenty and to spare. This Government should take a tip from that, pay off the national debt in good times, and be in position to help take care of the needs of the country and help in the return of prosperity when times are bad.

It is frequently said that we are making a dictator of the President. As a matter of fact, the Congress is simply placing broad powers in his hands for a temporary period. We were mandated by the people last November 8 to do what we are doing now, and when the emergency has passed, if before 2 years, I have faith to believe the President will forego the further use of these powers, and, at the furthest, the generous forms of relief legislation are only for a period of 2 years and will automatically cease to exist at that time.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he desires to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUFFEY].

Mr. DUFFEY. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee. On Thursday, March 9, 1933, the House of Representatives assembled in extra session in this Hall, upon a proclamation issued by the President of the United States, because of national emergency and because public interest required that Congress should be convened. Soon followed the passage of the economy bill (H.R. 2820), which I voted for at that time. Today we have under consideration the industrial recovery bill (H.R. 5755), to provide for the construction of certain useful public works. We have the serious proposal before us of meeting the national emergency of disorganization of industry and unemployment.

Title I supplements and liberalizes the present antitrust statutes, which grew out of a peculiar economic condition in the early '90s and sponsored by the distinguished Senator from my own State of Ohio, Senator Sherman. Today we have, to say the least, another peculiar economic condition; and as conditions have changed during the past 43 years, so, too, the rigid antitrust laws should in some form reflect a good solution to the existing economic conditions. That is the purpose of title I.

There is created in title II a Federal emergency administrator of public works, involving the expenditure of $3,300,- 000,000. And to meet the interest and the sinking fund charges, the bill provides for millions in taxes.

Taxation is a vexatious question; and it has always been so. Political parties rise and fall on this issue; and reasonable minds can differ as to what is the best method to be used in order that the Government can perform its proper function. A sales tax is not provided for under the terms of the proposed legislation. Ultimately we may have to come to a sales tax in our Nation, but today the people are not ready or willing to accept this form of taxation. Instead the proposed bill carries the added burden of taxes by an increase in the normal rates of the income tax and subjecting dividends to the normal rates of taxation and increasing the present excise tax on gasoline of three fourths of a cent per gallon.

It is a difficult choice as we reflect and study the general economic situation throughout our Nation.

Again we now are informed that the rules and regulations adopted under the provisions of the Economy Act are provoking wide-spread discontent and injury among the World War veterans and Spanish-American War veterans. This should be corrected, and must be brought about by the Veterans' Administration at the earliest moment. On April 21, 1932, I issued an announcement of my candidacy for representative in the Congress from the Ninth Ohio District and, among other things, then stated:

I favor immediate payment of the "bonus" to our World War veterans, in currency issued against the present surplus gold reserve, believing this method of payment economically sound governmental aid.

I repeat and reiterate now, 14 months later, that the payment of the adjusted-service certificates can and should be paid in currency in this manner.

Also, Mr. Chairman, if we are going to have an expansion of our currency, why cannot we have a real expansion? No one can deny that within the past 30 days we have had demonstration in a practical way of the benefits that come from a controlled expansion by the increase in credit facilities, and because our Government has plenty of gold. It seems to me that if we are going to have national economy; if we are going to relieve our burden by immediate and drastic retrenchment in the cost of Government rather than by increase in the burden of taxes, then it can and should be done by issuing the $3,300,000,000 in currency required to be expended to provide for the construction of useful public works in the proposed H.R. 5755.

This would provide real relief, and would be economically sound, and would avoid the burden of taxation which now rests so heavily on our people.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Beck] said that there are grave constitutional questions involved. I, too, recognize there are constitutional questions involved, but we cannot defer to legal opinions at this time of emergency, when honest difference in legal thought arises, and when every effort and consideration has been put forth to provide a bill to adequately meet the existing economic condition.

Mr. Chairman, the passage of this bill will further promote and round out the program initiated by our President and should result in an immediate revival of business and employment throughout the Nation. I intend under the present emergency to vote for this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he desires to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LEHR].

Mr. LEHR. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to take advantage of this opportunity to explain my reason for voting against the rule.

In my campaign last fall against my distinguished opponent, the former Member from Michigan, Mr. Michener, I criticized the Republican Party and my opponent for their method of controlling legislation through the so-called "gag rule", and I pledged myself to my constituents that I would oppose gag rule to the fullest extent of my ability and influence, and I have consistently done that in this special session of the Congress. My position in this matter is one of sound policy and conscientious principle. A gag rule is equally as bad and indefensible whether it be imposed by a Democratic or a Republican majority. I hold no brief for the Republican Members in criticizing the gag rule which this morning was adopted by such a narrow margin. As a matter of fact, their criticism is absolutely unjustifiable because, as it has been said here today by the gentleman from New York, this is just exactly the same sort of a rule that the Republican majority used while they were in power. On the other hand, the mere fact that the Republican majority made use of the gag rule in its palmy days is no justification or excuse, in my humble opinion, for the Democratic majority to make use of it now. We discussed the important bank reform bill on Monday and Tuesday of this week without imposition of the gag rule, amendments were permitted and debate thereon allowed even though such debate was extremely limited. There were no serious consequences as a result of that rule. The bill as finally passed and although but slightly yet constructively amended is a better bill than as it was as originally proposed, and I submit to the leadership of my party that it is offensive to the intelligence and loyalty of us Democrats who came here imbued with the idea to follow constructive leadership, to attempt to tie our hands so that a friendly expression and a reasonable interchange of ideas and suggestions cannot be had, and for that reason I resent deeply the attempt to tie my hands in this matter.

Before being inducted into this office I publicly stated that if Franklin Roosevelt wished to assume dictatorial powers in this emergency in an attempt to bring us out of this situation in which we find ourselves, then I should be glad to go along with him in that direction, and I have done so consistently, but that does not mean that we may not have constructive ideas of our own, and if we have, therefore we should have the right to present them to the Congress for its consideration and for its unfettered action. We ask no more than that, and we have a right to expect no less than that. I have voted consistently with the majority in this Congress with the exception of the Embargo Act, and my position in that matter I feel is justified, and with the further exception of the bill which yesterday was passed entirely through the aid of the large number of Republicans who voted for it, namely, the bill that authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make further loans of public money to defunct insurance corporations.

I voted against the gag rule today, not only as a matter of conscientious principle, to which I am entitled without in the least waving my loyalty to the cause of democracy or my allegiance to our splendid Chief Executive, but also because we now either have to vote for this bill, with its added burdens of taxation, in order to get the good things which admittedly the bill carries, or forego giving the unemployed of the Nation the opportunity of employment because of our objection to certain features of the bill.

Had the rule this morning which provided for the consideration of this present bill under a 6-hour debate, with no right to amend the bill, not been adopted by the Congress, it was my intention to offer an amendment to the bill to strike out from it all provisions of taxation. This bill has for its object the relief of the unemployed by appropriating the huge sum of $3,300,000,000 to finance a public-works program. That is a commendable proposition and is worthy of the sympathetic heart of our great leader in the White House, but the bill, in order to finance this proposition, places an added tax upon the already burdened taxpayer of the middle class. It increases the income tax on incomes of $4,000 and up to $10,000 by more than 50 percent, while it does not in the same proportion increase taxes on the extremely wealthy class of America; and then, too, it even creates a new form of taxation, that on dividends, and finally it increases the tax on the gasoline used by the operators of automobiles. All this is very objectionable. It should not have been in this bill. There is absolutely no justification for it. There is absolutely no reason for it. Within the last few weeks the Congress gave to the President the power to inflate and to enlarge and to expand the currency, and the result of the agitation for this inflation and of the enactment of this sort of legislation is already definitely pronounced throughout the entire country in the increase of employment, in the rise in commodity prices, and in the business upturn everywhere.

I feel that here and now is the psychological place and the psychological time in which to give an added impetus to this returned confidence and to this upturn in industry and in business. I pledged myself during the campaign that I would not favor the immediate payment of the bonus to the veterans if to do that would require any increase in taxes. I now say that this power of inflation which the Congress has given the President, namely, to inflate the currency in the sum of $3,000,000,000, could well be used by him to pay the soldiers' bonus. That would forever settle the bonus question. That would make it possible for the Government to settle its moral obligation to the veterans. That would place in the hands of the spending public of America $3,000,000,000 without any cost to the Government in the way of interest and at a time when it would drive forward betterment in our economic situation; and if, for some reason or other, it is not the intention of the administration to do that at this particular time, then I submit that now is the logical time for the administration to take advantage of this power of inflation and issue $3,000,000,000 worth of currency to finance this public-works program, as provided for in this bill. This will carry out all of the humanitarian designs of the President without imposing any extra taxation burden upon our people, and it should be done. Unfortunately, because of this gag rule which has been adopted, we cannot now offer such an amendment for the consideration of the Congress, and I feel that the people who will have to bear this burden of taxation, even though it be temporary and for but a year, are entitled to this information.

I trust that the committee which alone under this rule has the power to amend the bill will see fit to amend section 204. This bill was not submitted by President Roosevelt because of the great need for public works. We all appreciate that fact. As a matter of fact, the condition of our country today is not such as to justify such a program with that in view only. This measure has been proposed solely and entirely because of the tremendous unemployment throughout the country. The bill as originally submitted to the Ways and Means Committee provided for the allocation of $400,000,000 for the construction of highways and provided that three fourths of the money should be allocated on the basis of the Federal Highway Act and one fourth on the basis of population. That means that one half of the money under the bill as originally presented to the Ways and Means Committee was to be allocated on the basis of the population, one fourth on the basis of area, and one fourth on the basis of public-road mileage.

The Ways and Means Committee, however, has seen fit to amend the bill so as to provide that this $400,000,000 will be allocated on the basis of the Federal Highway Act, giving no special consideration to population or unemployment.

Under the bill as submitted by the President, New York State, for instance, would receive $25,400,000 for its 12,500,000 people, 30.6 percent of whom are unemployed. The State of Wyoming would receive $4,036,000 for its 225,000 people, 27.4 percent of whom are unemployed. There are 60 times as many people in the State of New York as there are in the State of Wyoming, yet New York State receives only six times as much money under the President's bill. The intensity of unemployment in New York State is 33 percent greater than it is in the State of Wyoming.

Under the bill, as amended by the Ways and Means Committee, New York State will receive but $20,200,000, while the State of Wyoming, with only one sixtieth of the people and about one eightieth of the unemployment that New York has, will receive $5,136,000, or 25 percent of the amount of money that the great State of New York, with its 1,500,000 unemployed people, will receive. Similarly very large inequalities exist in all of the other densely populated States.

I give you a list of the States which will lose under the amendment as suggested by the Ways and Means Committee with the amount that each State will lose:

	Loss
Alabama.....	$32,400
California.....	737,100
Connecticut.....	660,600
Illinois.....	1,990,100
Indiana.....	90,100
Kentucky.....	248,600
Louisiana.....	263,200
Maryland.....	484,000
Massachusetts.....	2,037,300
Michigan.....	795,200
New Jersey.....	1,912,200
New York.....	5,214,100
North Carolina.....	176,200
Ohio.....	1,668,000
Pennsylvania.....	3,468,100
Rhode Island.....	60,500
South Carolina.....	28,800
Virginia.....	92,700
West Virginia.....	312,500

I understand from the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] that the committee is willing to, and expects to, reestablish in this bill the plan as it was presented to them by the President, and I sincerely hope that at least this very much needed change will be permitted by the committee; and if this proposed change is agreed to by the committee, I shall vote for the bill in the hope that the relief to the unemployed will more than offset the added burden to the taxpayer and in the further hope that it will afford an added impetus to our economic recovery and also because I have the greatest confidence in the splendid leadership of Franklin Roosevelt. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MUSSELWHITE] such time as he desires.

Mr. MUSSELWHITE. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the national industrial recovery bill, because I believe our President is making a sincere effort to bring about what the very title of the bill suggests—a recovery of the national industrial system which has been severely ill for the past several years. I know the Ways and Means Committee has been confronted with a difficult task in framing this measure, and I believe its members have acted in good faith, but, gentlemen, I cannot help but express my opposition to the methods of raising revenue under this bill.

I need not remind you that taxation is a vital function of government, and that it is as necessary to the life of a nation as food is to the life of a body. There is no part of our system of taxation that bears scrutiny and careful consideration and revision more than the income tax. An income-tax levy, in my judgment, is a prosperity-time tax. In a depression such as we are now passing through, and I hope passing over, such a tax operates to exempt the Morgans and their wealthy partners and strikes hard at the purse strings of the man with a moderate income. You and I cannot escape the tax, but the wealthy manipulators of Wall Street can and do. The fundamental purpose of the income tax is nullified by the provisions of this measure, with its deductions, its exemptions, its exceptions, its modifications, its allowances, and its brackets.

The Morgans and the Harrimans can manipulate to show big losses and pay no tax—they find ways to escape, but there is no "out" for the little fellow. Take the case of a man who has a $100,000 corporation with say a net revenue of $6,000 a year. He is subjected to a double income tax, and in some States this is trebled. The corporation must pay an income tax on its profits, and the man must pay a tax on his dividend. In some States, like my own State of Michigan, there is an added corporation tax.

While on the income-tax subject there is one feature that I have long opposed and will continue to oppose. That is the exemption accorded State, county, and municipal employees. I hoped to offer an amendment to include them today, but, under the procedure the House has indicated it will follow, none but committee amendments will be considered. There are thousands of State, county, and municipal officials drawing salaries far higher than corresponding positions in the Federal Government or private industry who pay no tax at all and do not even have to make a return. This is a gross discriminatory feature which by all means should be eliminated from our system of income taxation. In Michigan there are presidents and superintendents of institutions drawing upward of $10,000 per year and who are housed in mansions maintained by the State who do not pay a nickel in income tax to the Federal Government.

How otherwise could we raise the money? Why, by the simple expedient of issuing currency—greenbacks—backed by national credit as authorized under expansion legislation already provided.

This bill singles out a few industries such as the automobile industry, the radio industry, and so on. It increases the tax you pay on gasoline. It increases the tax you pay on tires and tubes and other automobile accessories. It makes you pay a heavier tax on your radio receiving set. While I am opposed to all discriminatory taxes, that opposition is accelerated to vigorous denunciation when I see the automobile industry, which is the very lifeblood of Michigan, forced to accept additional burdens. It is unfair to the automobile manufacturers and automobile owners. If we continue to burden this great industry, unemployment will never be reduced in the big manufacturing centers.

Unemployment can only be reduced in Michigan when industry starts on the upgrade, and I submit that it cannot start upward if it must carry the load of burdensome and discriminatory taxes such as is proposed in this bill. I thank you.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK].

DEMOCRATIC TAX MEASURES DESIGNED TO RELEGATE THE MIDDLE CLASS TO THE REALM OF THE FORGOTTEN MAN

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, despite the pride with which the administration under the hard-boiled lash of its Budget Director points to the redemption of its pledge to reduce expenditures 25 percent, thereby balancing the Budget, the great middle class of our population, which numbers a vast majority of our people, find themselves confronted with the prospect of having to carry a greatly increased load of taxes. They see men of great wealth and influence resting on their oars, enabled by the efforts of shrewd employees to escape payment of taxes to their Government.

Despite the sensational disclosures of recent days which, if they have shown nothing else, should convince any sane man that our income tax laws are ineffectual, insofar as the upper brackets are concerned, and that any increased revenue to be derived from that source must come from the lower brackets, the Democratic leaders of this House insist upon repeating their mistake of last year by increasing the highest impost ever placed on the people of the United States in peace-time history, the larger portion of which must come out of the pockets of the backbone of the Nation—the middle class.

Disregarding the expressed opinions of business, industry, and labor, who through their various representatives appeared before the committee and urged the adoption of a general sales tax which would touch the pockets of everybody in proportion to their ability to spend without permitting anybody to evade their fair share of the load and penalizing the others for that evasion, the Ways and Means Committee after much deliberation continued to be "horrified" and decided to increase the crushing tax burdens of the middle class.

The one ray of hope held out by the administration—and it looks like the "big stick" in disguise—is that with the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and resulting harvest of gold from liquor taxes this load will be removed. It is difficult to believe that public-spirited officials would attempt to force repeal by such tactics. If this is not the intention, then there can be no excuse for such action except obstinacy.

Regardless of our convictions on the repeal issue, Congress has disposed of that question; it now rests with the voters of the several States. If the administration sees fit to use the machinery of the Democratic Party under the leadership of the Postmaster General to interfere with the affairs of the States, it may do so. We certainly cannot collect liquor taxes now, and if we could they would come for the most part out of the pockets of the very people we are endeavoring to help.

Congress will do well to listen to the voice of the people and insist that the Democratic leaders swallow their pride and enact the sales tax and not the present destructive measure, which will relegate the great middle class to the realm of the forgotten man, whom the majority leaders no longer champion.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, a bill of such magnitude coming before the House, now in committee for sharply limited debate, under a rule which permits no amendment, makes any expression in debate rather futile. Obviously, I cannot consider the details and the reaches of any of the separate titles, so in the time allotted to me today I want to point specifically to two things that I laid before the committee.

One has to do with a bill I introduced a few days ago and with reference to which I have visited the White House. The reaction to it there I have yet to know. I refer to the child labor bill (H.R. 5744), which I introduced on Monday last and of which I am not the author, because I simply added a section to a law that was passed by the Sixty-fourth Congress, signed by the then President and declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court by a 5-to-4 decision, as referred to a short time ago in debate by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the distinguished constitutional lawyer [Mr. BECK].

I have talked with several whom I deem to be good constitutional authority and who are recognized as such, and it is their opinion, as it is mine, that that child labor law which was declared unconstitutional by a 5-to-4 decision 16 or 17 years ago, might well be considered constitutional today, not only because of the fact that the personnel of the Supreme Court has changed since that time, but also because the Court's general line of decisions has been along a different line of thought and has embodied a different set of economic principles and has embraced a different social outlook and belief.

So I simply added to that act a new section which proposes to apply it for the emergency period of 3 years and which provides further that if at any time within the 3-year period the President of the United States might ascertain and might proclaim that employment conditions, as far as adult male labor is concerned, had again reached normal, the act should then become inoperative.

I call the special attention of the committee to the fact that the addition and the inclusion of this law in the measure now before us would not only make immediately available upward of 2,000,000 positions in industry but it would not endanger the rest of the act because of the separability clause which the committee has seen fit to put in at the end of the measure before us; and if the industrial recovery bill stands up from the point of view of constitutionality, then, inevitably, the child labor bill must also stand from the point of view of constitutionality.

Here is a chance at one stroke—and this stroke is denied us under the rule which we adopted today by a very narrow margin—to reemploy as many men as, and more men than, will be employed under all the rest of the huge measures now before us.

This, too, is in line with the thought of the President of the United States who, a few days ago, sent out an urgent appeal to the various State legislatures to hurry along their ratification of the amendment that was drawn and adopted after the law had been declared unconstitutional. Some States have responded, but it is a pitifully slow affair; and the other method, that of action by the States themselves with respect to the industries within the confines of each State, is also pitifully slow.

Now, you would not only reemploy men, if this child labor law were to be considered as an addition to the present law, but you make for better health and education and welfare among the stunted youth and the victims of industry, under age, in this land of ours.

This is one of the two thoughts I should like to lay before you for serious consideration. It may be that in this body we cannot do it. Under the rule it will be impossible, lacking committee sponsorship. This is one reason I so strenuously resented the application of a gag rule this afternoon. I hope, however, that another body will give this serious attention, and that, perhaps, if and when a conference report comes before us, we will be able, then, to have this question before us for decision.

The other question that I wanted to discuss in the time at my disposal is the matter of taxes.

In the earlier stages of the measure the tax question seemed to be purely incidental. I had hoped for a time that there would be no need to project the tax question into the picture, because under earlier legislation that had been crowded before the two Houses early in the session, the President of the United States was given, and now possesses, administrative power to pay for these improvements, or at least pay the interest on them and provide for the amortization of them, by the issuance of new currency; and thereby in a very modified degree apply the principle of expansion, reflation, inflation, or whatever you choose to call it. It seems the committee did not think highly of this proposal.

So instead of issuing money to pay for the interest on the bonds and the amortization thereof, if and as they are issued, we are going to issue these tax-free securities; and then we are going to tax Mr. John Q. Citizen, the man with the small income, for additional taxes in order to bring money into the Treasury to pay the interest on the tax-free securities and to amortize them. This seems to me to be an unnecessary and unjustifiable procedure.

If we have to submit to it, I say, let us seek for some kind of tax structure which will lay its hand evenly upon the man of modest means and the man of extreme wealth. Let us not make the receiver of a small income in the United States of America pay a tax larger than the most powerful industrial and financial magnates, as is being demonstrated in the hearings now being held at the other side of the Capitol. They are escaping without any payment whatever toward the cost of their Government, unbelievable as it may seem, while professional people, those employed in crafts and trades, even the secretaries and clerks, pay their share. Such a wicked condition cannot continue, and I dare to say this Congress will not permit it to continue.

We must apply higher surtaxes to these great incomes and reduce the possibilities of evasion through artful deductions and exemptions. It may be that we have reached the point of diminishing returns in seeking assessments on large annual incomes. It may be true, too, that we have raised the rate on incomes on estates which will not bring us in a great amount of revenue to the Treasury, although I do not believe so.

But let me solemnly say to this House that if there is a man in the United States that receives a net annual income for taxable purposes—that is, of more than a million dollars—then for the period of the emergency certainly it is only fair and right that he should pay a larger share than what he is now paying.

Then we come to seek a tax that will supplement the income tax. We are having a sham battle today between those who are urging the placing of a sales tax on everything the poor man purchases. "Oh", they say, "we will exempt clothing." Yes; but they do not tell you that it is taxing the cloth that the suit is composed of—it is taxing the buttons that go upon the suit, it is taxing the lining that goes into the suit, it is taxing the machinery that weaves the cloth, and the needle that sews it together.

I say that a sales tax in this Congress can never be passed. So that failing, we must look elsewhere to bring us larger revenues.

These are some of the reasons why some of us resisted the application of the gag rule. It grieves me to know that, although I asked my constituents to return me and although I assume the full responsibility of making the laws for them, I have to go back and tell them it was considered by the leadership here that it was my duty to give away all my rights to amend a measure, and that I had to yield to that leadership or, even worse, to someone entirely outside this Chamber for decisions, instead of following my own convictions, freely formed after the best study I could make. That, to my mind, is not legislation, and is not proceeding according to the rules by which we should be operating.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides the machinery that will permit the establishment of a maximum workday and a maximum workweek, and fix a minimum wage. These factors are essential to any legislation which is designed to restore American industry, revive and spread employment in the Nation. They will wield a double-edged sword that will strike at and destroy a great evil that exists in industrial America today and which threatens the whole structure—namely, sweated labor.

Sweated labor involves millions of our workers. It has invaded every major industry. It knows no geographic limits. It exists in every section of the country, in every State in the Union, and it affects every division and branch of American industry. Today it is drawing its numbers from the youth of the land, paying a mere pittance, involving long hours, exhausting their strength, killing ambition, and limiting opportunity. It affects the womanhood of the American worker where it leaves the same trail of exhaustion and human wreckage. It constitutes a menace to the dignity, the skill, and real worth of American labor. It threatens our workers with serfdom.

In competition with this ugly system, legitimate business either must adopt the plans and practices of sweated labor or take the road to financial ruin.

Involved in such methods, labor is driven to lower working and living standards. Industry cannot prosper and know earnings in conflict with that institution. The Nation cannot survive if that system flourishes within our borders—a system that capitalizes on human misery, want, and woe. This bill, if it had no other virtue, would deserve your consideration and support.

The measure will provide activity for national industry and resut in reemployment. It will mean the return of purchasing power to millions of workers and the restoration of a healthy, economic condition in the Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOZIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that Committee had under consideration the bill H.R. 5755 and had come to no resolution thereon.

BOARD OF INDIAN COMMISSIONERS (H.DOC. NO. 57)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and order printed.

To the Congress:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 1, title III, of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, I am transmitting herewith an Executive order abolishing the Board of Indian Commissioners.

There is no necessity for the continuance of this Board, and its abolition will be in the interests of economy.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 25, 1933.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—SUSPENSIONS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, next Monday is the fifth Monday. I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker be authorized to recognize Members for suspension upon that day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman inform the House what suspensions he expects to take up at that time.

Mr. BYRNS. I shall have to let the Speaker answer for that.

Mr. SNELL. I do not want to object to the gentleman's request, but I should dislike to see the provision brought up here at that time to change the fundamental law of Hawaii in accordance with the suggestion made by the President and passed under suspension of the rules. Otherwise I have no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. I shall have to leave what they are to the Speaker. I do not know.

Mr. SNELL. Is that one of them?

The SPEAKER. I think that is one. There are two suspensions. Is there objection?

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to object; I think the RECORD should show that there are 400 Members who are not here who have no opportunity to object.

The SPEAKER. Every Member has an opportunity to be present and object. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet tomorrow at 11 o'clock a.m.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.
